K-State probably saved me. I went to college, and he didn't want me to go. He wanted me to stay with him or at least drive back every weekend to be with him. When I didn't agree to do that, he broke some of my furniture. I threw my Lit book, and he blew out of my life, taking the storm but leaving the wreckage for me to deal with.

When I saw the table in the Union last week with the shiny, happy girl sitting behind it, I walked by. As I passed, a name sprang into my head.

The little girl was his daughter. She's a teenager now, just two or three years younger than me when I first met her father.

I wonder how she's doing, if her father teases her about her weight to "help" her diet. I wonder if she ever uses my hiding place between the sink and the shower to ride out her father's temper.

I wrote her name on the red paper heart. She was a strong little thing with a tighter grip on her father's heart than I ever had. Every so often I see a dark girl with long black hair walking down the street, and I think of her. I wonder if she'll find the eye in the storm and leave like I finally managed to do.

When the speaker comes, I'll go. My buck helped bring him here, and I owe it to myself and the other women to do this. The days I think about that year and a half have gotten further and further apart. I hope some day they'll stop completely, and the thought of him and his sharp words won't make my brain shudder.

But until then, I'll keep giving dollars and hope that everyone finds the end of their storms.

Increased community support answer to men's basketball team's slump

Editor,

This letter is in response to all the people who insist on criticizing Tom Asbury, Manny Dies and the rest of the men's basketball program. One question: If you think you can play better than Dies or anyone else on the team, why don't you prove it? Asbury does accept walk-ons. If you don't want to try out, then just shut up.

The problem with the men's basketball program is simple. No one supports them. Not the student body, alumni, administration, faculty, staff or the general population. The football team had this support, at least from the administration. Those who do go to the basketball games show up at least 10 minutes late and then leave at least 10 minutes early. Except for a few handfuls of students, no one makes any noise during the game. It is really pathetic when the students yell louder for some free pizza or when someone fouls out than they do to support the team. Why would any player or recruit want to play for this school? All they get is a whole bunch of criticism and zero support.

Does everybody need to be reminded of how "successful" the football program was before and in the beginning of the Bill Snyder era? It took him more than five years to show improvement. Let's not forget the last two games of the season. I guess everyone outside of Manhattan was right about the football team being overrated.

Current generation of students fails to express spirit of K-State

Editor,

I have been a member of the K-State faculty for 18 years and the Manhattan community for more than 26 years. In the last five years, I have begun to be increasingly cynical about the current generation of students, and after reading R.A. Hartman's column "Environment Yields to Street Construction" in Thursday's Collegian, my fears seem confirmed. Please don't think that I am an ivory tower "fuddy duddy." I care about young people. But I am discouraged.

First of all, Hartman is seriously misinformed. He claims that one effect of the Anderson Avenue construction was the removal of "several trees," which he referred to as "antiquated squirrel homes." The fact is, the Anderson Avenue project requires the removal of more than 180 trees, many of them mature. The tree killing has only begun in the stretch between Denison and Sunset avenues. Several homes are going to be torn down as well. One is already demolished.

Hartman asserts strongly that the project was done to ensure the safety of everyone using the street. As those of us against the project pointed out in many meetings a year ago, the fatalities at Anderson Avenue intersections involved either speeding or drunk driving. Many of the non-injury accidents were the consequence of many inexperienced drivers, i.e., college students being the majority motorists in the area.

Hartman also said losing the trees along Anderson is worthwhile because "the gains are increased road safety and appropriate commuting times." Do students other than Hartman understand that in this area of the city that is by far the most heavily used by pedestrians and bicyclists, the new, wider, faster Anderson will actually put non-motorists in more danger?

It's discouraging that Hartman did not do his homework, that he did not research his topic and learn all he could about a big debate that was waged only a year ago. The Manhattan Mercury and the Collegian were filled with articles about the issues involved in the project. Educated people don't offer easy, "knee-jerk" reactions.

But he's not alone. The same shallow thinking and lack of preparation on the part of too many 1997 student senators allowed them to pass a resolution that, in effect, put the student body's stamp of approval on this project. The cabal of student senators who pushed the resolution through did so because the project was heavily supported by the upper administration, in part because it would tie in with the site of the new alumni center.

I remember a different kind of student than the one represented by Hartman. Most of today's students probably have never heard of the Castle Crusade of the student body of 1975. That class alone is responsible for the fact that Nichols Hall is still standing. Nichols Hall had been firebombed in the late 1960s, and for years it was simply abandoned. The students of the mid-70s felt that Nichols visually represented the spirit of K-State. They loved its limestone, castle-like appearance right at the edge of campus. They loved the sloping lawn and the myriads of tall, beautiful trees surrounding it. When the administration announced plans to tear Nichols down and build a large, ugly, monolithic structure similar to Blumont Hall in its place, the students rebelled. The administration turned a deaf ear to them, but the Student Senate in those days had conviction. It passed a resolution against demolishing Nichols, demanding that it be renovated instead, and when the administration ignored them and went ahead with its plans, it made T-shirts and placards with the picture of Nichols on the front and formed a protest group called the Castle Crusade. Every day, increasing numbers of students picketed Anderson Hall. The administration refused to budge, but when eventually hundreds of students jammed the steps of Anderson, President Acker relented, and Nichols Hall was renovated and preserved.

Those students made me proud to be a part of this university. They gave me and the rest of the faculty housed in Nichols a magnificent building with wonderful offices and a state-of-the-art theater. I have spoken to some of the alumni who were part of the crusade; they are heart sick when they look at the Anderson side of Nichols today. The grandchildren of today's students will not be grateful to them for improving a couple of intersections, as Hartman suggests. Instead, they will hold his generation accountable for one more example of the destruction of the environment that they will have to inherit, one that already is badly compromised and getting worse. People like Hartman and groups like the 1997 Student Senate made a mockery of the Castle Crusaders' efforts. Nichols Hall is a monument to the Class of 1975. The back of Nichols Hall is a monument to the Class of 1998 and current students like Hartman. Too bad his shallow values bequeath his grandchildren a future full of parking lots.

KANSAS LEGISLATURE

Bill hits roadblock in committee hearing

Debate pits tax cuts against education spending

■ Law would make minor obtain parental consent before having an abortion.

By DAVID MILES
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A bill that would require minors to obtain parental consent before having an abortion ran into a roadblock Tuesday during a hearing before the House Federal and State Affairs Committee.

Legislators shared their legal, philosophical and practical concerns about the bill.

"We obviously have a lot of work to do if we're going to be working this bill," said Chairperson Susan Wagle, R-Wichita.

The bill would require females younger than 18 wanting to have abortions to get written consent from at least one parent or guardian.

Under current law, a minor's physician must notify at least one parent before performing an abortion, but parental consent is not required. The bill would repeal the section of law on parental notification and replace it with the new language on consent.

Rep. Lisa Benlon, R-Shawnee, objected to the greater restrictions that the bill places on the physician's ability to waive the measure.

Current law does not require notification when the physician believes "an emergency exists that threatens the health, safety or well-being of the minor as to require an abortion." The bill would permit abortions without parental consent when the procedure is necessary to save the girl's life and there is not enough time to obtain consent.

"The woman has to be on her deathbed before she does not have to ask for consent," Benlon said.

The bill also would exempt from the consent requirement minors who are married, have been married or are not under parental custody.

In addition, the bill would allow a district court judge to bypass the parent and authorize an abortion.

Rep. Becky Hutchins, R-Holton, who requested the bill, said she would agree to amending the bill to allow a minor to seek a judicial bypass if her parents withheld consent.

Some opponents of the bill argued before the committee on Monday that the bill is unconstitutional because a girl could not use the judicial bypass if a parent already had refused to grant consent.

Wagle wondered how much practical effect the bill would have.

"Parental consent, effectively, would not be too much different from parental notification because in either case, the minor can seek judicial bypass," she said. "I'd like to see more parental involvement."

Kansas Rep. Tom Burroughs, D-Kansas City, said he is worried the measure does not provide adequate protection to a minor who may be afraid to tell her parents that she is pregnant.

"Once this child has the procedure, they're going to have to go right back home," Burroughs said.

Jeanne Gawdun, legislative director of Kansans for Life, the state's largest pro-life group, said the bill represents progress despite its shortcomings.

Although Gawdun said it is too easy for a minor to receive a judicial bypass, she said the law gives parents more say in their child's abortion decision, and it would require the Kansas Department of Health and Environment to keep track of the number of judicial bypasses.

"We're trying to make small steps forward," Gawdun said.

TOPEKA — The dominate issue of the 1999 session was clearly framed during Senate debate on Tuesday: Should the Legislature's top priority be reducing taxes or funding programs, particularly public education.

Minority Democrats said it is premature to pass tax reduction measures before knowing how much money is going to be available later this session to beef up spending for education and other programs.

Majority Republicans said the state has done well financing education, and needs also to address business tax issues, especially those that keep Kansas economically competitive with other states.

The debate was a precursor of what likely will be repeated many times in the second half of the session, with spending for highways, higher education, juvenile justice and social services also important components of the discussion.

Senate Democratic Leader Anthony Hensley of Topeka said the Senate should set priorities before it begins passing educational funding and tax relief measures.

"This is, I suppose, the beginning of where we're going to place our priorities," he said. "On this side of the aisle, we'd like to support education, but we recognize we also need to consider tax reductions."

The Senate advanced to final vote on Tuesday a school finance bill that would increase base state aid for kindergarten-through-12th grade education by $44.1 million more than is being spent in the current fiscal year, and $8.7 million more than Gov. Bill Graves recommended.

The debate was a precursor of what likely will be repeated many times in the second half of the session, with spending for highways, higher education, juvenile justice and social services also important components of the discussion.

The bill increases the per-pupil base state aid by $50, from the current $3,720 to $3,770. Graves proposed a $35 increase, and a coalition of educational organizations want it raised by $100.

The Senate also endorsed for passage bills to provide $8.6 million in tax relief next fiscal year to businesses by increasing the income tax credit on machinery and equipment used in industrial production, and $1.9 million more to people who adopt children by doubling to $2,500 the income tax credit they get.

Both would be refundable credits, meaning taxpayers get refunds from the state, not just a credit against their tax liabilities.

Senators in both parties pointed out that the school finance bill does not address a critical issue that likely will require additional funding: districts that lose enrollment and consequently have their state aid reduced while their costs do not take a similar drop.

Some 170 of Kansas' 304 local school districts expect to have their enrollments decrease, and are looking to the state to help them financially to soften the loss in per-pupil state aid.

Sen. Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, chairperson of the Senate Education Committee, said she would schedule hearings on the declining enrollment issue.

Senate Assessment and Taxation Chairwoman Audrey Langworthy, R-

Prairie Village, said the bill increasing from 15 percent to 20 percent the amount of refundable income tax credit that businesses realize on the property taxes they pay on machinery and equipment was good for the state economically.

"I would hope to do more for education, but this (tax credit) is one issue that becomes part of a bigger whole."

Hensley moved to pass over the business tax-relief bill, noting, "It puts us at a disadvantage to piece the puzzle together in this fashion. 'What we ought to do is set priorities.'"

Cats, Hawks battle for higher conference ranking

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Both the K-State Wildcats and the Kansas Jayhawks will feel a sense of urgency when they meet tonight at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

K-State is in need of conference wins, as well as road wins, as it's left fighting for respect and positioning in the Big 12 before the conference tournament in March.

As for KU, it is coming off two straight losses, one of them at home. Home hasn't been too sweet for the Hawks this season. The 62-game winning streak at Allen Fieldhouse came to an abrupt end this season when the Jayhawks lost to Iowa. KU later added home losses to Missouri and Nebraska.

"I would anticipate, given the urgency, and where we are in the standings and what little we have left, there would be a huge sense of urgency for this team," Cats head coach Tom Asbury said.

K-State stands at 16-9, 5-7 in the conference, while KU isn't far ahead with a 16-8 overall record but has an 8-4 mark in conference play.

The Cats are led offensively by junior guard Cortez Groves with 10.8 points per game and junior forward Tony Kitt with 10.1 per contest. Junior guard/forward Josh Reid is posting 9.7 per game for the Cats as well.

Kansas has a quartet of double-figure scorers. Sophomore Eric Chenoweth leads the pack with 13.4 points per game, while senior Ryan Robertson puts in 13.2. Freshman guard Jeff Boschee and junior guard/forward Nick Bradford average 10.4 and 10.3, respectively.

With the loss of two All-Americans and one of KU's best three-point shooters, Asbury said KU just shouldn't be as good as in previous years.

"I've said it all along and continue to say it," Asbury said. "When you lose three guys of the magnitude of Paul Pierce, Raef LaFrentz and Billy Thomas, you lose your inside, midrange and your perimeter guy. How could they be as good, particularly on the offensive end?"

"To me, that's all the explanation I have time to worry about. That's probably why their record wasn't what it was. They lost some big players," Asbury said.

The Cats are coming off a victory at home against the Baylor Bears but know that if they're going to upset the Hawks in their house, they will have to improve over their last performance against KU.

In round one, the Hawks won by a 23-point margin at Bramlage Coliseum on Feb. 1. Senior point guard Chris Griffin said they can't afford to play that way again.

"We just need to play hard, play physical, play smart, just play our brand of basketball," Griffin said. "We need to play defense, rebound the ball well."

"I don't think we did any of those things last time. We didn't put the ball in the basket, didn't defend very well. I think that KU was just more physical than we were."

Asbury gave KU credit for beating them earlier this month but also said the Cats played poorly. He said in order to contain KU this time, they must stop Chenoweth and the guard play of Robertson and Boschee.

"Chenoweth didn't kill us here, but I think he's a guy that is very, very capable of doing that," Asbury said. "I think you've got to contain their guards, Robertson and Boschee."

"And yet, saying that, those three guys didn't kill us here. I think we just killed ourselves here. I thought they played well, but I just don't think we played very well. The score was indicative of that."

Wildcats look to upset intrastate rival at Lawrence, attempt to break 5 year losing streak against KU

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jan. 17, 1994.

On that day, 14 games and five years ago, the K-State men's basketball team upset No. 1 Kansas in storied Allen Fieldhouse. Since then, the Wildcats have failed to beat the Jayhawks at any venue.

For the second time this season, K-State will attempt to shatter the losing streak against its rival. Tonight, the Wildcats will attempt to do it in perhaps one of the toughest places to play in the Big 12 Conference — Allen Fieldhouse.

"I would say it's right up there as one of the hardest places to play," junior guard/forward Josh Reid said. "Their fans are so good. It's tough to play there. This game is just as big as any other game."

With one exception, senior guard Chris Griffin said Allen Fieldhouse is probably the toughest place to play in the Big 12.

"It's a tough atmosphere," he said. "I think Oklahoma State's Gallagher-Iba Arena is a tough place to play as well. You have to be tough to go into any conference away games."

"KU will always be KU. But, this is a different basketball game because of the rivalry."

Before the Jayhawks were stunned by Iowa, 85-81, KU rode a 62-game winning streak at Allen Fieldhouse, which at the time was the nation's longest home winning streak.

Although KU has lost three games, two to conference opponents Nebraska and Missouri at Allen Fieldhouse, it is on track to achieve a school record for average home attendance. Through 11 home games, the Jayhawks have averaged 16,273 fans per contest.

Despite KU's losses at home, head coach Tom Asbury said he would still feel safer if the game were played at Bramlage Coliseum instead of the feared Allen Fieldhouse.

"I'd personally rather play them at home than away," he said. "I'd rather play anybody at home than away. If you look at the series, with the exception of one, we have played them a lot better over there than here."

In Lawrence, KU holds a 70-34 advantage over the Wildcats, but K-State's 17 wins in Allen Fieldhouse are still the most of any opposing Big 12 team.

Last year in Allen Fieldhouse the Wildcats lost to the Jayhawks by seven points on Jan. 17. With the exception of a 20-point drubbing in 1997, K-State has lost by an average of only six points in the past four meetings in Allen Fieldhouse.

Reid said it's still not definite whether the Wildcats can upset KU in Allen this year.

"It's hard to tell," he said. "I think they are going to come out tough. It can be done, though — that's the thing to keep in mind."

"The last few years we've played them tougher in Allen than we have here for some reason. Hopefully, this year will be the same way."

RATHER PLAY THEM AT

LOOK AT THE SERIES,

Pitching key in victory against Panthers;
Cats come back after 3 weekend losses

K-State opened its shortened home season Tuesday by rebounding from three weekend losses to defeat the York Panthers 10-0 at Wayne Norvell Field.

The Wildcats were led by a multi-faceted pitching attack that featured five pitchers, led by senior starter Brandon Peck, who was perfect from the mound, facing only six hitters in his two innings pitched, while earning his first victory of the season.

As a whole, the Wildcats gave up only four hits to York, two of which were bunt singles in the fourth inning. Combined, K-State's hurlers struck out eight Panthers while giving up no walks.

"I was happy to see us come out and throw strikes," head coach Mike Clark said. "When you have no walks and no errors, you win a lot."

The Cats pounded out six hits against the Panthers, beginning in the first inning when freshman third baseman Brett Reid doubled in junior second baseman Chad Tabor to put K-State ahead 1-0.

The contest remained close until the fourth inning, when the Wildcats sent 11 batters to the plate and exploded for seven runs. Senior designated hitter Quinn Cravens led off with an infield single, then advanced to second on sophomore Mark English's fielder's choice.

Sophomore center fielder Michael Colosimo singled to right field to score both Cravens and English. Freshman catcher Tim Doty then reached base on an error, and freshman shortstop Kyle Boyer walked to load the bases. Tabor reached base on a fielders choice, and Colosimo scored.

Sophomore left fielder Kasey Weishaar then became the second Wildcat to earn a walk in the inning. Doty later scored on a wild pitch before Reid reached base on an error, scoring Weishaar and Tabor.

Cravens, at bat for the second time in the inning, singled to left field to score Reid and give the Cats an 8-0 lead.

The win ups K-State's record to 2-5. Clark was unsure of how his team would respond after the series, which concluded with the Cats losing 11-3.

"It's always good to see some positive reinforcement," Clark said. "I was encouraged to come out and see some positive things. Clemson gave us a lot of areas to polish up and work on."

The Wildcats shuffled their lineup against York, starting seven freshman in an attempt to settle on a starting lineup for upcoming games.

Among the positions up for grabs are center field, designated hitter and spots in the starting rotation.

"We've got to continue to work with our lineup to prepare for Big 12 play next week," Clark said.

K-State will play four straight home games, beginning with a double-header against Iowa at noon Friday and with games against Air Force set for 3 p.m. both Saturday and Sunday.

Buffaloes look for redemption against Cats

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two weeks ago, K-State guard Kristin Rethman silenced the Colorado crowd by hitting a three-point shot with 2.3 seconds left to play, giving the Cats a 59-57 road win.

Tonight is rematch time.

K-State, 6-6 in conference play and 13-9 overall, will be looking to distance itself from Colorado, 5-7 in conference play and 12-10 overall. The two teams are in the middle of a pack of Big 12 teams who are battling for position as the Big 12 tournament approaches.

Rethman said that after the initial meeting, she expects Colorado to enter the game looking for redemption.

"I think they will come in ready," Rethman said. "I think they think it was a fluke that we beat them there."

K-State is 8-3 at home this season, and Colorado enters the game with a 2-7 road record. Rethman said the team is looking to continue its winning ways at home.

K-State coach Deb Patterson said she is glad to be playing at home after a tough road loss to Oklahoma. Oklahoma defeated K-State 79-58 on Saturday.

"I'm excited to be back at home," Patterson said. "We have had tremendous crowd support."

Rethman said the Cats, with four conference games remaining, are looking to make a push towards the NCAA Tournament.

"These next few games are really important, because how we do will determine our seeding and whether we go to the Big Dance or not," Rethman said.

The Cats had difficulties playing against the Sooners without forward Angie Finkes. Patterson said even though forward Brandy Harris stepped up and played well, the loss of Finkes threw the team off balance.

"It is tough when you have to continue to make major adjustments," Patterson said.

K-State has had a variety of injuries this season, and its depth has decreased considerably with the loss of Jenny Coalsen to back problems and Dee Deshay to an ACL injury — injuries that affected the Cats before the season started. During the course of the season, Rethman and guard Essence Perry have battled through broken fingers, followed by Finkes' leg injury.

Patterson said the length Finkes will be out is undeterminable, but it will be at least another week.

"It just depends on the extent of the injury," Patterson said.

Meanwhile, Colorado enters the game looking to bounce back from a 70-86 road loss against Iowa State. Patterson said Colorado, for a young team, has quality depth.

"They might be one of the youngest, deepest teams in the country," Patterson said.

GAME NOTES
The Buffaloes lead the all-time series, 25-16, but the series is tied in Manhattan, 9-9. K-State's 59-57 victory in Boulder earlier this year was its first road victory in the series since Jan. 21, 1987. Rethman sealed that victory with a three-pointer with 2.3 seconds left. The Cats are 3-2 against ranked teams this year. K-State is in a three-way tie with Baylor and Oklahoma for fifth place in the conference. K-State will be back in action Saturday at Iowa State.

Switzer's non-judgemental approach endears him to surrounding community, future students Happiness can be such a difficult thing to obtain.

So many inhabitants of this planet search for the thing in dollar amounts, hollow friendships and meaningless luxuries, only to find years later that their idea of happiness didn't amount to anything.

For a slight few, however, happiness doesn't require turning your life into an endless search to locate it. Instead, these individuals' approach to life results in happiness.

In the two short sessions I've had with Veryl Switzer, I've seen a living example of a man who let happiness find him. Heck, they weren't even hour-long conversations about humanity and the triumph of the human spirit that led me to this conclusion. Switzer just possesses that quality that lets you know his true colors the minute the silence is broken.

The kind of person who could make a day of fishing even better with humorous anecdotes and stories of life's long journeys, Switzer's laid-back, non-judgmental approach has endeared him to those seeking advice or just in need of a willing listener.

To many, he's considered the true embodiment of K-State, a person who exemplifies integrity, humility, accomplishment and any other word that defines success.

VIEWPOINT

Starting from an athletic background, Switzer tasted the fruition of success on the football field and took his physical prowess to the heights of the NFL, but that only begins his journey to happiness.

A diligent worker looking to repay the human race for its kindness to him, Switzer's involvement in youth programs across the nation revealed his true greatness. For the past 30 years, his uncompromising dedication to K-State and its student body has helped countless individuals reach their goals and tackle their dreams. With these examples of involvement, Switzer has found happiness that eludes so many.

In the midst of a week's worth of celebration in honor of the favorite son of Nicodemus, Kan., the entire campus has a chance to learn about the relatively unknown effect Switzer has had on Manhattan during three decades.

Take advantage of this. So often, we never know about individuals who have played a significant role in our lives or the surrounding community until they've left our realm for good.

This week's festivities will help illustrate what Veryl Switzer has meant to the Wildcat populace, but there's more to be discovered about the man who helped erase ignorance and build bridges for future generations. The answers lie no further than a simple Q&A session with the man himself.

Unlike many who disappear the minute their retirement celebration ends, Switzer will remain on campus, planning out a new direction in life and waiting for the next curious soul to wander into his office and discover what makes one of K-State's most endearing figures tick.

To some, this random run-in would be wasted time. Switzer sees just the opposite. The chance to communicate with people and learn more about their thoughts on anything, big or small, is what has carried him through the years.

When asked about his role in the lives of America's youth, Switzer joked that the involvement he's experienced made him feel younger than he should.

And while others strive to find an ounce of joy, Switzer's simple approach has resulted in a life filled with happiness.

K-State SGA leaders talk with legislators about higher education

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the Student Governing Association attended State Education Day on Tuesday along with students from other Kansas Board of Regents schools to talk to legislators about higher education concerns.

Jake Worcester, Student Senate vice chair, said they spoke with legislators about what they saw as big concerns for regents universities, what they would like legislators to address and why it is a concern.

Faculty salaries seemed to be the legislators' No. 1 priority, said Brad Montgomery, student cabinet governmental relations director.

"They know that there's a problem, and they're trying to fix it," he said.

Besides faculty salaries, SGA members also discussed library funding and state financial aid with legislators.

Elizabeth Gregory, student governmental relations committee chair, said the legislators listened politely to their concerns, but she said she understands they have other priorities, too.

"The main thing we always run into is that there is only so much money in the pot, and everyone wants a share of it," she said.

Gregory said sometimes regents issues get put on a back burner, but the students still need to fight to stay a top priority.

Montgomery said he thought they were received well by the legislators, and the day was successful.

"I learned a lot just about how higher education is being perceived in the capital," he said.

Montgomery said most of the legislators support higher education and are working hard to improve it despite other issues.

Worcester said he thought some legislators were skeptical.

"But, that's what you get when you have representatives from other areas of the state, and they have other interests," he said.

The issues the SGA members addressed to legislators also went out to the public. Two radio stations, one Topeka and one Lawrence, were there, Student Body President Tracey Mann said.

As a follow-up to State Education Day, SGA members will go to Topeka again for Cats in the Capital on March 10.

Worcester said Cats in the Capital includes a reception for the legislators. K-State will provide food for the legislators and talk informally with them.

"And, hopefully get a chance to talk about some issues specific to K-State beyond what regents want," he said.

Mann said SGA members also will write letters to follow up the day. He said they would send letters to legislators with whom they met to thank them, and to the ones with whom they didn't meet to share their concerns.

He said he felt the day was a success. "It was a phenomenal day," he said.

9 Alumni Fellows on campus today

■ 2-day program honors distinguished alumni.

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nine distinguished K-State alumni will be on campus today and Thursday for the annual Alumni Fellows program.

The program began in 1983 to recognize K-State alumni who have distinguished themselves in their field of expertise, said Jodi McGatlin, KSU Alumni Association director of constituent programming.

The program is sponsored by the Dean's Council, the President's Office and the Alumni Association. Each college can nominate the alumnus of its choice to represent the college as its Fellow.

All Alumni Fellows will attend an orientation breakfast today and a recognition banquet Thursday, McGatlin said. The rest of the time will be spent with the college the Fellow was chosen to represent.

"The program typically lasts for two days, and each college sets the agenda for their own Fellow," she said. "They can do anything, but they usually teach a few classes and meet with student leaders, faculty and advisory boards."

The purpose of the program is to honor alumni for their success as well as to give current K-State students an opportunity to learn from professionals in their field of study, McGatlin said.

Representatives from several colleges said the program has been successful in the past.

"The program is very effective for two reasons," Larry Erpelding, associate dean of agriculture, said. "It allows students to learn from distinguished alumni, and it also provides opportunities for current students to network with successful K-State graduates. It helps us bring together outstanding alumni with students and faculty."

This year's Alumni Fellows have distinguished themselves in their areas of expertise in a variety of ways. They have been influential in Kansas, the United States and around the globe.

The Alumni Fellow chosen by the College of Agriculture is Bernie Hansen, owner and president of Flint Hills Foods. Flint Hills Foods is a meat-processing company based in Alma,

All Alumni Fellows will attend an orientation breakfast today and a recognition banquet Thursday, McGatlin said. The rest of the time will be spent with the college the Fellow was chosen to represent.

Kan., that has expanded greatly under Hansen's management, Erpelding said.

Hansen, a 1970 graduate in agriculture education, will speak to five agribusiness, marketing, meat-processing and food-safety classes during his stay.

The College of Engineering chose Payless ShoeSource Vice President Larry Strecker to represent it, said Richard Hayter, associate dean of engineering for external affairs.

Strecker recently returned from Taiwan, where he spent several years on behalf of Payless.

He will teach several classes within the Department of Industrial and Manufacturing Systems Engineering and meet with students and faculty. Hayter said he will also become a new member of the College Advisory Council.

"Not all Alumni Fellows are invited to join the Advisory Council for our college," he said.

"This is a special opportunity to honor Mr. Strecker."

Elizabeth Fennema, Alumni Fellow from the College of Education, will also be on campus this week. Fennema, a 1950 K-State graduate, recently retired from the University of Wisconsin where she researched gender and mathematics for 25 years, said Marion Goldston, assistant professor of elementary education.

Goldston said Fennema has been very successful in research based on past and present perspectives on teaching math and is honored Fennema is coming to campus.

As well as making presentations for education students, Fennema will also attend a luncheon with the women's studies programs.

"This is one alumni you won't want to miss," Goldston said.

"IT HELPS US BRING TOGETHER OUTSTANDING ALUMNI WITH STUDENTS AND FACULTY."

K-State veterinary medicine students acquire training as volunteers at Sunset Zoo

HANDS-ON EXPERIENCE

Mouradian-Darby takes a second to play with a coati while cleaning its cage during her volunteer shift Friday afternoon. She has volunteered at the zoo weekly since June of 1997.

Volunteering at the Sunset Zoological Park gives K-State College of Veterinary Medicine students the opportunity to learn about the biology and maintenance of exotic animals and about how to educate the public about them.

Shanee Anderson, curator of education at Sunset Zoo, said of the 100 current volunteers, or "docents," about 50 are pre-veterinary or veterinary medicine students.

Amanda Mouradian-Darby, second-year veterinary student and assistant zoo keeper, said she has been working with the zoo since she came to K-State in the fall of 1995. "It's a lot fun, and it's a big stress relief. All of the animals have such personality," she said.

K-State's Pre-Vet Club is a good way to find out about the zoo's docent program, said Nicole Caraway, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, who volunteers about three hours a week at the zoo.

Before anyone is allowed to volunteer at Sunset Zoo, they must first complete a semester-long docent course, Caraway said. Taught at the zoo, the course teaches basic biology, classification and general information about the animals. The course also talks about how to deal with the public and children at the zoo.

Kathleen O'Brien, senior in animal science and publications co-chair on the docent executive board at the zoo, said the program is open to anyone over the age of 18, and not just to veterinary majors.

Nathan Culley, senior in veterinary medicine, said he became involved in the docent program during his freshman year, and although he is out of the program and in vet school, he said he enjoyed the experience.

"I'd been out to the zoo my freshman year here and saw a pamphlet," Nathan Culley, senior in veterinary medicine, said. "It was kind of neat to have a behind-the-scenes opportunity."

Culley's five-year tenure at the zoo lasted until he entered his sophomore year of vet school.

"My first year I volunteered somewhere around 200 hours," he said.

Anderson said the docents perform a variety of different duties, depending on the interests of those involved.

Duties and tasks that go with the job include preparing diets for the animals as well as exercising the animals. Docents also clean and take care of the "education animals," which are animals used to teach the docents in their classes. The education animals are also used by active docents who serve as Animal Ambassadors. The ambassadors take the animals around to local schools and give presentations using the specific animals.

"I learned a lot of handling skills with the education animals, with the reptiles, reptiles and small animals," Culley said.

"In a way, it's the highlight of the animals' day," she said.

The docents also give zoo tours and help with birthday parties at the zoo.

"The actual educating of the public was the best for me," Culley said. "I had so much fun taking kids around the zoo on tours and watching their eyes light up."

Most of the docents said the experience they gain at the zoo is invaluable.

"I enjoy the hands-on work with the animals that you don't get to work with in school," Caraway said.

"The vet school really looks highly on students who were docents in the past," Caraway said she thinks the exposure to the docent program helped her to get accepted to the vet school this year.

Culley, meanwhile, said his experiences giving tours helped his public-speaking skills.

"I was able to speak in front of large crowds without being too afraid of it," Culley said. He said he knows from past experiences how hard it is for some people to talk in front of groups, and giving zoo tours and working as an Animal Ambassador helped him to overcome that fear.

"The biggest aspect of the docent program is the amount of knowledge you learn about the animals and being able to teach it to others," Culley said.

Caraway said she agreed.

"You learn those practical skills that you normally wouldn't learn until you're in practice," Caraway said.

The program comes highly recommended by current and past docents, Mouradian-Darby said, and she encourages anyone interested to apply for a position.

"I've learned so much about the animals and the husbandry," Mouradian-Darby said. "If they are willing to put in the time, I really think it's an unbelievably worthwhile experience."

"IF THEY ARE WILLING TO PUT IN THE TIME, I REALLY THINK IT'S AN UNBELIEVABLY WORTHWHILE EXPERIENCE."

Veterinary medicine program prepares students for work with exotic animals

The College of Veterinary Medicine's Exotic Animal, Wildlife and Zoo Animal Medicine Service prepares veterinary students to work with novel private pets and with wildlife in zoos, both in and out of state.

Some graduates of the program also are regular features on Animal Planet TV shows.

Dr. James Carpenter, professor of clinical sciences, is the head of K-State's Exotic Animal Service, which he started in 1990.

The Exotic Animal Service is a three-week elective cycle in which two professors and interns work with vet students of senior standing. They spend three days each week at Sunset Zoological Park, where they spend time treating the animals as well as taking in sick and orphaned wild animals.

In addition to this, the service handles 12-15 cases of exotic pets taken in by their owners each week.

What sets this elective course apart from others, though, is the amount of time students must devote to it and how intensely it prepares vet students for going out into the work force, Carpenter said.

Ned Gentz is one veterinarian who had an internship with K-State's Exotic Animal Service from 1993 to 1994.

Gentz now is the director of Veterinary Service at the Wildlife Center of Virginia.

"We're the leading hospital for wildlife," Gentz said. "To give you an indication of our scope, I just finished dealing with a bald eagle in the wild."

For the past year, the hospital has had a TV series called "WildLife Emergency." The program airs on Animal Planet on Thursday and Sunday nights.

"It's like 'ER' with animals," Gentz said, who appeared in all 13 episodes last season.

Gentz said he was very pleased to get the job, of which only 10 to 12 exist in the United States, he said.

"I feel fortunate to be able to do what I like to do as well as feel like I'm making a difference," he said.

Gentz said, however, he still feels ties

Over the past nine years, the service has trained more than 21 interns, which is more than any other college in the country, Carpenter said.

to his internship at K-State's vet college.

"I'm not technically an alumnus," Gentz said, "but I'm proud to be part of KSU."

Over the past nine years, the service has trained more than 21 interns, which is more than any other college in the country, Carpenter said.

Of these interns and students who participated in the exotics service, many have gone on to work in zoos.

Dr. Danelle Okesson, a 1996 graduate of K-State's veterinary medicine college, now works at the newly built Rolling Hills Conservation Center in Salina, Kan., as an educator and part-time vet.

The center, which has a staff of 28,

Historical Costume Collection serves as educational tool

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

With more than 15,000 articles of historical clothing housed in Justin Hall, one could say the building is almost a museum.

The Historic Costume Collection was developed at the turn of the century by K-State's College of Human Ecology, said Marla Day, instructor in the college and curator of the collection. The pieces of clothing in the collection date back to as early as 1740, and as recent as the mid-1990s. The collection, Day said, was established to educate students in apparel and textile classes.

"The students in these classes study the design details of the clothes, the construction methods and what was done to enhance the garments," she said.

Deb Meyer, assistant professor in the College of Human Ecology, said the articles of clothing in the collection reflect the changing attitudes and styles of the periods in which they were produced.

"Historically, the pieces show changes in society. You can document changes in society, such as gender roles, through costumes," Meyer said. "These pieces also can increase our level of understanding about cultural changes."

Recently, Meyer said, three outside experts came to assess the collection and determine what pieces were appropriate for use in the classroom setting. Of the 15,000 items in the collection, she said, 10,000 were deemed appropriate for teaching purposes.

When the articles of clothing in the collection aren't in classes being analyzed, they are used in fashion shows put on by the classes.

Day said because of the value of the articles, protective materials are put into the garments during the shows and then are taken out to be dry-cleaned afterwards.

"We take plenty of steps to ensure the clothing is cleaned and protected," Day said.

The collection's most recent acquisition was a line of Calvin Klein pieces the university received last year. The Klein collection found its permanent resting place at K-State after being showcased in places such as London, California, Colorado and the Kyoto Museum in Japan.

In order to receive the pieces, Day said she had to submit a proposal to the Calvin Klein company stating how the university intended to use the pieces in the collection.

Soon after, Day said, K-State's proposal was accepted, and now the Klein pieces are included in the collection. The pieces were introduced to the public last year at a fashion show at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Since then, Day said, she has seen an increased awareness and interest in the collection by members of the community.

"The response has been phenomenal," she said. "The pieces have raised awareness of the collection here. It's very prestigious to have the pieces here."

Angie Olinger, senior in interior design, models one of the Calvin Klein pieces in the Historic Costume Collection. The collection houses 15,000 articles of clothing, some of which are more than 250 years old.

Day said she currently is trying to acquire articles of men's clothing for the Klein collection, which is now composed entirely of women's clothing.

The staff of the collection has many other goals for coming semesters, Meyer said. Not only are they searching for more culturally diverse pieces to add to their collections of Chinese, African and American Indian clothing, she said, but they also are in need of pieces from specific time periods.

"We're looking for pieces dating before 1840, and we even are in need of pieces from the 1970s and '80s," Meyer said.

Meyer said those pieces from the 1970s and '80s usually can be located at establishments such as the Goodwill or Salvation Army, but because the clothes are becoming popular once again, they are difficult to find.

This is why, she said, donors are needed for the collection.

"We're always looking for donors, both monetary and clothing," Meyer said. "In addition to clothes, we also need to concentrate on getting more monetary donations."

The donations and funds would go toward making more room for additions to the collection, Meyer said, because space is limited.

"With the money, we'll create more space to update the storage facilities and support the staff that maintains the collection," she said.

Ultimately, Meyer said, the clothing collection has now is a good indicator of the fashions of tomorrow.

"Using what we've seen in the past, we can predict the future," she said.

2 Live Crew greatest-hits album a 'miserable compilation' of songs

By TODD STEWART
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

It might be the next great oxymoron. 2 Live Crew's "Greatest Hits, Vol. 2" could not be a more inappropriate title for a collection of songs. There's nothing great about this group, and they never had any hits either.

But, in this day and age when every artist, popular or not, is releasing greatest hits albums, even the notorious Florida rap group had to throw its hat into the ring.

Scary enough, you'll recognize several of the songs but for many of the wrong reasons. The 1989 release "As Nasty As They Wanna Be" caused quite an uproar in the music industry, and the band has managed to parlay that notoriety into a somewhat stable career.

"Me So Horny" and "F--- Shop" were both on that 1989 release and should cause the same sort of disturbance. They did for me.

The lyrics are dull and sexist, and the music is unoriginal and annoying. To find any sort of redeeming quality in these songs is a difficult chore.

In fact, to find something original might be an even more difficult task.

Adaptations of Roy Orbison's "Pretty Woman" and Manfred Mann's "Doo Wah Diddy" are incredible injustices to staples of American music.

The public relations release accompanying the compact disc boasts Orbison would be "rolling over in his grave," if he ever heard the 2 Live Crew rendition of his popular song. Well, Orbison is rolling over in his grave, along with every other artist who has made worthwhile contributions to the music industry.

2 Live Crew takes music back two steps for every one song it records. Even "Banned in the USA" and its sample of the Bruce Springsteen hit "Born in the USA" is hard to handle.

All that said, I feel I have to give some sort of justification for the 1/2 star I awarded the disc. I am ashamed to admit it, but I did find three minutes on the CD worth listening to.

"Me So Horny" has always been a song that repulsed me, but the updated version titled "Bill So Horny" does much more for me. Let me explain.

Bill in "Bill So Horny" is President Clinton, and the whole song is a pretty funny rendition of the whole Clinton and Monica Lewinsky affair. Most of the lyrics in this song are just as vulgar as the original version, but they are much easier to handle in this context.

Most of the lyrics are still too obscene for this paper to print, but I wouldn't be doing my job if I didn't give listeners at least a peak into the only redeeming feature of this CD.

"Gore always ask him why he sex so much/It's the perks of being prez, you always get a nut/Since you're married to Tipper you shouldn't be sad/Don't tell Hillary so she won't get mad."

But it's still not enough to save the disc. It's still a miserable compilation. Even the small amounts of humor in "Bill So Horny" cannot justify purchasing this release.

Unoriginal, uninspired groups like 2 Live Crew are the reason rap music, and the people who listen to it, get a bad rap.

Photographer, speaker to show slides tonight

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The Union Program Council will sponsor a presentation by wildlife photographer and inspirational speaker Jack Winfield Ross at 7 tonight in Union Little Theatre.

This multimedia presentation will include a slideshow and discussion of Ross' work, as well as an inspirational message for his audience.

Ross has spent more than 30 years traveling across North America while capturing its natural wonders in photography. His photos, with subjects ranging from the Canadian Rockies and Alaska's national parks to Florida's shoreline, have adorned magazines, posters, book jackets, compact disc covers and more.

Anyone curious about Ross' most recent work can look at the cover of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife brochure. As part of his work, Ross has been documenting the organization's attempts to save the red wolf from extinction.

UPC Issues and Ideas and Outdoor Adventures committees joined forces to bring Ross to Manhattan. Tiffany Pollard, senior in biology and vice president of administrative affairs at UPC, said she was impressed with Ross' photography skills.

"His work is absolutely gorgeous," she said. "The slides of his work will be a great part of his talk."

Ross stumbled upon his talent with photography while trying his luck at a singing/songwriting career in Nashville, Tenn. Ross' initial work with his mother's antique camera in the Great Smoky Mountains led him to his current profession.

Ross has said his years of photography have helped him to discover much about himself.

Nate Kettle, sophomore in open-option and UPC Outdoor Adventures chairman, said he thought Ross' more recent works should draw a crowd for the event.

"We've brought him to K-State before, and his presentations go very well," Kettle said. "He sent us a folder of more of his work, and we got together and decided to have him back."

Ross' presentation will conclude with his thoughts on naturalists such as Sitting Bull and Aldo Leopold, Pollard said.

"He'll show slides of his work, but he's also an inspirational speaker," she said. "His talks are about getting out there and being determined and succeeding at what you do."

College students begin investing with caution

By JESSICA THOMAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Scenes from the movie "Trading Places" illustrate how the stock market is perceived by many college students.

"Nothing you have ever experienced can prepare you for the unbridled carnage you are about to witness. ... In this building, it's either kill or be killed. One minute you're up half a million in soybeans and the next, boom! Your kids don't go to college and they've repossessed your Bentley."

Most investments, however, are not that dramatic.

Corey Hopkins, junior in business administration, has been investing for almost one year and said it is an easy way to make money.

"I don't have to work for it," he said. "I sit around, and I either make money or lose money," he said.

Stephen Harrison, investment representative for Edward D. Jones & Co., a Virginia-based investment firm, helps college students with their first investments.

"The concept is to help them learn how to start investing and what to do with it," he said.

"Most of the time they start with small amounts of money and put it into mutual funds. Occasionally, if they have money that they've inherited from a grandparent or something, they'll buy individual stocks," Harrison said.

Harrison stresses research to anyone interested in investing.

"We just sit down and try to learn as much as possible about the companies they're interested in investing in. During the first interview, I like to find out if they're serious about investing," he said. "I suggest books for them to check out at the library and if they're serious, I think they will take the time to learn about the stock."

Harrison said anyone who is serious about investing can start, even if they don't have a lot of money. He said some students start with $250 dollars.

"Most college students should start a habit, and that is to invest on a regular basis," he said.

For students who are just investing periodically, Harrison suggests mutual funds because they allow investors to put in smaller amounts of money and are more diversified. An investor who puts money into a mutual fund is spreading that money among many different companies. This ensures that if one company loses money, the total investment doesn't suffer.

Harrison said investing is not a quick way to get rich. Investors must be patient in order to make money in the stock market.

"How much you make depends on Investment advisers say students' patience will bring returns

how much risk you're willing to take and how long you are willing to invest. If you're not going to invest for at least five to seven years, then you shouldn't start at all," he said.

"You need to be investing for money down the road, like for a car or house. Most college students aren't patient enough to make a lot of money in the stock market," Harrison said.

Harrison's advice for first-time investors is to do research.

"Don't invest until you've learned a lot, until you've read the books," he said. "There are enough finance classes on campus, and those are the first places you should start."

Hopkins said he was first introduced to the stock market after his parents invested.

"My parents talked to their stock broker and transferred some shares from their name to my name," he said. "I talked to an investment banker about my plans to invest, and he knew where it would be a good place to put it."

Bryan Devore, senior in accounting, also has some experience in the stock market.

"I was lucky — I just kind of fell on it," he said. "I worked at Dillons in high school, and I had them take some money out of each paycheck to put into the company stock."

"I still have the stock, and I check on it from time to time. I don't plan on getting rid of it. I'm just sitting on it right now," Devore said.

Hopkins said he is confident his money will continue to grow and will be available when he needs it at a later time.

"The stock that I have looks like it's doing well and will continue to in the future," he said. "If something very serious happens and I need the money, I will pull it out or if I need to make a major purchase like a down payment on a car or a house. Otherwise, I will probably keep it in the market for at least five years."

While investing in a single company involves more risk, it also can mean a bigger payoff. Hopkins currently keeps his money in mutual funds but has plans to invest in a single company.

"Over the summer when I have a job,

I will try to set aside everything I don't need, and I'll put it into an individual company that I've been researching," he said. "It looks like a strong company, but even if it goes under, it's not my life's savings."

"I'm young. I have forty years to make up for it. When I'm older, I'll want a guarantee because I will be living off that money, but right now I'm willing to take more risk," Hopkins said.

Hopkins agrees knowledge is key before investing.

"If you are interested in investing, first, do research. Learn about companies and their future plans," he said. "Get on the Internet, look at graphs and find out what the numbers mean. Then, talk to a financial adviser. Invest for the long run and put your money where it will be the most useful."

There are many classes offered by the university in the economics and finance departments that can help students learn about specific financial situations, including investing.

Any student who is considering investing should check out Personal Investment and Risk Management taught by finance instructor D.C. Lehman.

"All of the students in the class are interested in investing," Lehman said.

"It's a general education class that is open to any student. There is a broad spectrum of majors, and there are students in there from freshmen to seniors."

During the first part of the semester, the students learn about risk management and financial planning. In the second half of the semester, they learn about stocks, bonds, mutual funds, how to spot good buys and investment strategies.

This is the fourth semester Personal Investment has been offered, and interest in the class is growing, Lehman said.

"There are about 50 people in the class, and there is a waiting list," she said.

"There are also people who just want to sit in on it," Lehman said.

Subhrendu Rath, visiting assistant professor in finance, teaches a class called Security and Portfolio Analysis, which is an upper-level business course that helps students learn about stocks.

"My students analyze stocks that they would like to buy and present their research to the class," he said.

The final piece of advice for future investors comes from "Trading Places."

"Think big. Think positive. Never show any sign of weakness. Always go for the throat. Buy low. Sell high. Fear ... that's the other guy's problem."

houses many endangered species, such as the white and Indian rhino and the white tiger.

Okesson also provides workshops for teachers in continuing education and is a tour guide for the center.

Okesson has been working at the center since it opened last year and said she enjoys seeing the development it has undergone in that period of time.

"It's great to see this place grow," she said.

"As far as construction, we're still in phase one right now. Out of our 95 acres, we have 55 developed, but we have lots of room to expand."

Charlie Walker, a Salina businessman, proposed the idea for the center a few years ago, Okesson said. The Walker family also provides much of the funds for the zoo.

"We're unique because we're one of the few zoos that are publicly funded, but we've had private investment," Okesson said.

Because it isn't open to the public, Okesson said, the center is not yet an official zoo.

"We will apply to become one of the 150-plus fully accredited zoos across the nation, once we open our doors later this year," she said.

Carpenter said most veterinarians don't work in zoos right out of vet school, like Okesson.

Mel Shaw is one of the veterinarians who used his experience at K-State from 1990 to 1992 to obtain a job as a staff vet at a zoo. Shaw works at the Birmingham Zoo, located in Birmingham, Ala.

With his new job, Shaw said, the day's activities can vary and keep him quite busy.

"I deal with anything that talks, slithers or croaks," he said.

"There are over 800 animals here.

This is great because I hate doing the same thing all the time."

Carpenter said that due to the paucity of veterinary positions in zoos available, the exotics department doesn't primarily focus on zoo medicine.

"Our emphasis to our students is not zoo animal medicine," he said. "It's just that there's not many openings out there. So we work with zoological medicine. The students love it, and every year, or every other year, there's one who really goes in that field."

There are only 300 positions for veterinarians who want to work in zoos, Carpenter said, and there are only four full-time zoo veterinarians working in Kansas.

However, opportunities are available for those who are diligent about applying, Carpenter said.

"If a student is really motivated and works hard, they might be able to make it," he said. "There's a lot of sacrifices, but it can be very rewarding."

running back] J.J. Smith out to lunch," Wefald said. "He's back here now due to the encouragement of Veryl Switzer.

"Probably six or seven former football players who went on to pro careers or tried this and that and didn't graduate are now back here," he said.

Though his departure will leave a void in Wildcat athletics and with athletes, Switzer said he is satisfied that now is the time to move on.

"The opportunity of the Colbert Hills junior golf academy came up, and I couldn't turn it down," he said.

Switzer said he was taken aback by the outpouring of gratitude that the university has shown him this week.

"I can't explain it to you, I'd probably stumble all over myself if I tried," Switzer said. "This recognition by the university is the greatest reward I could have received."

taken seriously, we have to take seriously threats like this," Bacon said.

In Ankara, Deputy Iraqi Prime Minister Tariq Aziz defended his government's threat.

"The U.S. and British planes are killing Iraqis, are destroying Iraqi property, and this is not acceptable," Aziz said Tuesday. "A Turkish air base should not be used by the Americans and British to hurt Iraqis."

Bacon said Incirlik is at "the very outer edge" of the range of Scud ballistic missiles Iraq might use against Turkey and is protected by a small contingent of U.S. Army Patriot antimissile missiles. Iraq said it has no more Scud missiles, but U.N. inspectors aren't sure.

Bacon said Iraq's depleted air force would stand little chance against U.S. and allied air defenses in Turkey, Kuwait or Saudi Arabia.

"I don't think that they have significant air power to be able to launch a longer-range attack against bases deep inside another country's territory, and it would be extremely unwise for them to try to do that," Bacon said.

At the State Department, spokesman James Foley said the administration remained opposed to lifting remaining U.N. restrictions on Iraqi oil sales.

With U.S. approval, the U.N. Security Council permits Iraq to sell $5.2 billion worth of oil every six months provided the proceeds are used to purchase food, medicines and other humanitarian supplies.

President Jacques Chirac of France is expected to urge President Clinton during a White House visit on Friday to end remaining restrictions.

Foley said the United States and France agreed "on many tough challenges." But, he said, "the United States does not favor the lifting of the oil embargo."

Clinton pitches Social Security plan to students

■ GOP questions plan's effect on national debt.

By KEVIN GALVIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a satellite-linked address to college campuses across the country, President Clinton made his case for shoring up Social Security and Medicare to people who might be called the "sandwich" generation: today's college students who could get stuck supporting their baby-boomer parents while trying to raise families of their own.

Clinton drew sharp distinctions between his plan's use of federal budget surpluses to reinforce the retirement system before the aging of his generation overburdens it and the Republican idea of using the extra cash to slash taxes by 10 percent across the board.

"Their idea sounds simple, sounds good, even sounds fair — 10 percent for everybody," Clinton said Wednesday. "Our idea will give you a stronger economy, will save Social Security and Medicare, will stabilize families, will strengthen the ability of the United States to lead the world."

The message came home to students watching at Philadelphia's Temple University.

"It sounds like I'm going to be retiring shortly after all these benefits run out," junior John Champ said. "It does make me think about what I'll do."

Anthony Gilbert, junior in broadcast television, said he hadn't considered himself "that old to really think about" Social Security until he listened to Clinton.

"We're not going to be young forever," he said. "It's something you should think about, for your parents and grandparents also."

Meanwhile, Republicans began picking apart details of Clinton's plan and said they had begun work on alternative legislation, particularly a measure to counter an administration proposal for creating 401(k)-style accounts to invest some of the retirement system's funds in stocks.

They also questioned whether Clinton's Social Security plan would drive up the national debt. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Archer, R-Texas, said his analysis of the president's budget found that government-held debt, mostly in the form of IOUs to the Social Security trust fund, would increase from $1.8 trillion in 1998 to $3.5 trillion in 2004.

"This is a classic case of the president being less than trustworthy with the American people," Ari Fleischer, Archer's spokesman, said.

Clinton's Universal Savings Accounts would target tax credits to low- and middle-income working Americans who choose to save more for retirement and allow the government to make bulk investments of the funds in the stock market.

Republicans, who argue that it would

Only 3 attend broadcast at K-State

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Clinton's Social Security discussion was transmitted to the K-State Student Union from the White House on Wednesday, but student attendance was far below expectations.

The discussion, which was scheduled to begin at 1 p.m., was designed to allow students an opportunity to hear Clinton's thoughts about Social Security. The broadcast was sent to about 40 colleges and universities, said Sherry McCrory, manager of the Manhattan Social Security Office.

McCrory said only three people attended the event, including herself and one student.

"I think part of the problem was it wasn't done far enough ahead of time," McCrory said. "If they had told us about it sooner, we might have had time to get the word out."

The problem finding students to attend wasn't solely at K-State, though. McCrory said she had talked to people in charge of the event in both Lincoln, Neb., and Wichita. Both had similar troubles finding students to attend, she said.

Students taking studying abroad to all-time high

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More K-State students are studying abroad than ever before. More than 120 students have participated in semester-long overseas exchanges this school year. The number is up from previous years, said William Richter, associate provost for international programs.

Richter said numbers are increasing because of concentrated efforts by the Office of International Programs to provide more opportunities, encourage participation and gain increasing support from faculty and staff.

"One example of the growth in opportunities that has become available to our students is our exchange program with two universities in Prague," Richter said. "Several years ago, the program started with one or two students a semester, and now we have 25 students going each direction every year."

International exchange programs are not the only way K-State students can study abroad, said Elfrida Nafziger, coordinator for group study abroad.

"Group study programs are opportunities for K-State faculty members to take students overseas for travel study courses," Nafziger said. "These courses can be a semester in length, but many are available during the summer months. They are usually worth from one to three

Bill uses privilege fees to fix Union computers

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A bill to allocate $60,696 of privilege fee reserves to the K-State Student Union for the upgrading of computer systems in order to be Year 2000 compliant will go before Senate tonight.

The money would be used for a server-based solution to Y2K compliance. A server system called "Thin Client Technology" would be implemented with the funds if the bill is passed.

"We are going to end up replacing a whole lot of PCs unless we go with a 'Thin Client,'" Kyle Hutson, computer and electronics coordinator, said. "By implementing the server system, not only is it cheaper even in the short run, it's cheaper in the long run, and our timelines are reduced as well."

Space limitations and speed processing in earlier computers limited computer programmers to only the last two digits of the year. These limitations don't exist today, but some programmers have continued to use only two digits. This will create problems in the year 2000 because some computers will recognize "00" as 1900, causing systems to work improperly or fail altogether.

Hutson has been working on the Union's Y2K compliance for more than two years. The amount of money that compliance originally would have cost the Union could not have been covered by the Union or even the privilege fee reserves, he said.

"The real heart of our database credibility problems is our internal databases," Hutson said. "We have accounts receivable, accounts payable, payroll, the Educational Charge Account Program, work orders — those are our primary ones. We don't know if they're Year 2000 compliant or not."

The Union reduced its costs by updating already-existing programs and making sure new programs were compliant including the K-State Student Union Bookstore point-of-sale program, food-service point-of-sale program,

Snyder fills gaps in football coaching staff

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The departure of one assistant coach and the addition of two more have led to significant reshuffling in the K-State football coaching staff.

Head coach Bill Snyder plugged remaining holes by naming former James Madison University and University of Kansas defensive coordinator Bob Fello and former K-State quarterback Matt Miller to his staff on Wednesday. Fello will coach the defensive ends, while Miller was appointed the tight ends coach.

Additionally, the long-rumored departure of defensive coordinator Rex Ryan to become defensive line coach of the Baltimore Ravens became reality last week, prompting Snyder to name secondary coach Phil Bennett as the team's new defensive coordinator.

"Phil Bennett's vast experience and successes as a defensive coordinator throughout his career made him the perfect person for the position," Snyder said.

"Our players are excited about his selection. He is one of the most respected defensive coordinators in Division I football."

Before joining the K-State staff at the start of the year, Bennett had served as defensive coordinator at Iowa State, Purdue, Louisiana State, Texas A&M, and Texas Christian.

He spent last season as the secondary coach under Ryan at Oklahoma, and will retain that title along with his new duties.

To account for the other gap left by Ryan's departure, Snyder moved Jim Gush from defensive ends coach to linebackers coach, in turn hiring Fello to take his place.

Fello is already familiar to some of his new colleagues. During his stint as KU defensive coordinator, Fello was an unwelcome sight on the opposite sideline for Snyder.

"I always remember how well Bob's defenses played against us in the early '90s," Snyder said.

Fello is also familiar with Bennett, having served under him during Bennett's run as Texas Christian defensive coordinator. Fello had positions as defensive line coach and special teams coordinator there from 1995 to 1997.

The only holdover from last season's defensive coaching staff will be interior defensive line coach Mo Latimore, who will retain the position.

Snyder said past relationships would be useful as the rebuilt defensive staff begins to cohere.

"Both Bob and Jim have worked with Phil at earlier times in their careers, which will help bring quick continuity to our defensive staff," he said.

Miller's appointment completes the staff on the offensive side of the ball. After finishing a career in which he set Wildcat records for passing efficiency, completion percentage, and yards per completion, Miller began serving as a student assistant

NCAA to announce decision today

A decision in the NCAA's investigation of K-State football will be announced today, according to a press release issued by the NCAA on Wednesday.

The decision will be revealed and explained at 11 a.m. during a news media teleconference. Presiding over the conference will be Bonnie Slatton, the acting chair of the NCAA's

MURPHY

Division I Committee on Infractions.

The NCAA investigation dates to last summer, stemming from impropriety involving the recruitment of current K-State running back Frank Murphy. Upon discovering that Murphy had received money from a booster to purchase a car, the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics suspended Murphy for two games and reported the incident to the NCAA.

The NCAA responded by suspending Murphy for two additional games, and began the investigation of K-State football. Friday's Collegian will feature a full report on the NCAA's ruling.

— Rich Smith

coach in 1996. He has spent the last two years on the staff as a graduate assistant coach.

Snyder spoke highly of Miller and of his chances for a successful transition to full-time coaching.

"Matt Miller has taken an active role in coaching during his years as a graduate assistant and as an undergraduate assistant coach," Snyder said. "He has a very strong understanding of our offense and commands great respect from the players in our program."

Miller's appointment as tight ends coach means a shift in the division of duty along the offensive line. Paul Dunn, who coached the offensive tackles and tight ends last season, will now coach the interior offensive line, replacing Mark Mangino, who departed for Oklahoma.

Unlike Mangino last season, Dunn will remain responsible for the tackles as well as the interior offensive line.

The rest of the offensive coaching staff

Man dead after car crashes into elementary school

COLUMBIA, Mo. — A man died Wednesday after he lost control of his car and crashed through the window of a second-grade classroom. None of the 22 children in the class were injured seriously.

The 7- and 8-year-old students were out of their desks on the other side of the room looking at a pet guinea pig when the car crashed into the room at Grant Elementary School.

The car landed on top of a vacant desk. Eight children were treated for scrapes and bruises.

Mason Gene Martin, 73, was pronounced dead at University Hospital and Clinics about an hour after the crash.

Police said they still were investigating and did not know whether the driver died from injuries suffered in the accident or from other causes as he drove the car. They had not determined how fast the car was moving at the time of the crash.

Witnesses said Martin had left the parking lot of a public library across the street from the school in his Honda Accord. The car passed between two trees and through a railing before crashing through a basement window and into the classroom.

'Death with dignity' proves foes wrong, journal says

SALEM, Ore. — In the first year under the nation's only assisted-suicide law, 15 terminally ill people in Oregon used it to end their lives, and there was no evidence they suffered painful, lingering deaths as opponents had warned.

In a report published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, Oregon health officials also said fears the law would be used as an easy way out by people afraid of financial ruin or extreme pain was unfounded.

Rather, health officials found that use of the law has so far been driven overwhelmingly by the desire of strong-willed patients to exercise some control over the way they died.

"Many physicians reported that their patients had been decisive and independent throughout their lives or that the decision to request a lethal prescription was consistent with a longstanding belief about the importance of controlling the manner in which they died," according to the report.

The first report on Oregon's Death with Dignity Act showed that doctors prescribed lethal drugs to 23 people in 1998 but that six died from their illnesses before using the drugs. Two others still were alive as of Jan. 1.

Thirteen of the 15 who took the lethal drugs were cancer patients. The others were suffering from heart or lung diseases.

The average age of those who took their lives was 69.

Backers of assisted suicide said the report shows the law is working well and confirms their predictions that only a small number of people make use of it.

Leaders fund campaign in order to regain Democrats

MIAMI — Organized labor leaders, hoping to reclaim the House for Democrats and influence other political campaigns, agreed Wednesday to pour more than $40 million into the 2000 elections and start spending the money earlier than ever.

A measure approved by the AFL-CIO executive council at its winter meeting here requests each affiliate union to donate $1 per member — about $13.5 million a year for two years — to mobilize union voters. Coupled with political money in regular budgets, the federation's spending for 2000 campaigns would total $40 million to $46 million, union officials said.

"No matter what we raise, we will be out-raised by the business community 10 to 1," said Gerald McEntee, president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

GOP members said they felt differently.

"... If they don't participate in the 2000 election cycle, the liberal elite and unions will attempt to buy the next Congress to install their agenda of back-room politics," said Scott Hatch, executive director of the GOP House campaign committee.

McEntee told reporters after the private vote that none of the AFL-CIO money will go directly to candidates or political parties. Instead, he said, it will pay for telephone banks, flyers at workplaces, newsletters, mailings and television advertising to educate union and minority voters about key issues.

Such grass-roots efforts almost always benefit Democrats over Republicans. "Winning back the House is a big goal," McEntee said.

Labor spent nearly as much money in the 1996 presidential election cycle. This time, however, the effort is starting a year earlier, creating a continuous campaign cycle for labor's political operations.

Even as they talked boldly about winning back the House for Democrats, some union leaders said they won't shy away from supporting moderate Republicans who support their issues.

Teamsters President-elect James P. Hoffa interrupted a hallway interview to shake the hand of GOP Rep. Peter King, a moderate from New York. Turning away, Hoffa called King the kind of Republican labor can't avoid supporting, saying, "We're certainly aware of who our friends are."

New book to give details on Lewinsky, Clinton affair

LONDON — Monica Lewinsky's book detailing her affair with President

Clinton will be published on March 5, her publisher said Wednesday.

"Monica's Story," the result of Lewinsky's collaboration with Princess Diana biographer Andrew Morton, will be released simultaneously in the United States and Britain, said Lorraine Tyler, spokeswoman for Michael O'Mara publishers.

Michael O'Mara, chairman of the publishing company, has said Lewinsky was drawn to his publishing house by Morton's involvement.

"She likes the idea of an author who is used to writing sympathetic books about women who have relationships with powerful men," O'Mara said. "It wasn't the money. She could have got much higher prices elsewhere."

Lewinsky has agreed to give her first TV interview to ABC's Barbara Walters, but it can't be done until Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr grants permission. ABC is hoping to run the interview during the February "sweeps" period, which ends March 3.

Judge will not be asked to step aside in Jones case

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Judge Susan Webber Wright will not be asked to step aside from the Paula Jones case, in which she is ready to consider holding President Clinton in contempt, sources said Wednesday.

Clinton lawyer Robert Bennett would not say whether he planned to ask the judge to step aside. Nor did Bennett say anything Tuesday about the contempt issue during a telephone conference among the judge and attorneys involved in Jones' sexual harassment lawsuit against Clinton.

John Whitehead, an attorney for Jones, said Wednesday his side will not ask the judge — who dismissed Jones' lawsuit last year — to excuse herself.

After the conference, Wright issued an order saying she was ready to address the contempt issue.

Wright said in her order that she did not believe there was any reason for her to step aside.

Wright first raised the contempt issue in a footnote to a Sept. 1 ruling in which she said she was releasing Clinton's testimony in a Jan. 17 deposition in the Jones case. In that footnote, Wright said she "has concerns about the nature of the president's January 17, 1998, deposition" but "makes no findings at this time regarding whether the president may be in contempt."

Prieto, Bainter enter presidential race

■ Candidates highlight rental inspections, transportation as issues.

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Knowledge, service and unity are what Leo Prieto and Chris Bainter are basing their campaign platform on for student body president and vice president.

Decked in their K-State campaign shirts, Prieto, senior in pre-law and Spanish, and Bainter, junior in computer engineering, announced their candidacy Wednesday at the free-speech zone.

Prieto and Bainter told a crowd of 50 about the three issues they said they wanted to implement as student body president and vice president.

Their first issue deals with rental inspections. Prieto said he believes there is a need in Manhattan for mandatory rental inspections. He said more than 12,000 students live off campus, but only about 200 get their houses inspected.

Prieto said he did research on this last year and had his house inspected.

"They found 11 violations," he said. "I thought I lived in a fairly safe place."

Many of the cities of Big 12 universities already have a similar program implemented, Prieto said.

"It's a win-win situation," he said. "Not only will students be more safe and living in healthy conditions, but property value will go up."

The second issue Prieto and Bainter said they would like to address is the transportation problem in Manhattan.

They said they wanted to work with the city of Manhattan to get a public transit system that would take students to class.

"Leo and I believe we don't have a parking problem but a congestion problem," Bainter said.

Bainter said they also would like to implement a Saferide program into the transportation plan.

"This will help decrease traffic on campus during the day and increase safety at night," he said.

The Saferide program wouldn't just be for students who had been drinking, but for anyone who needed a ride at night, Bainter said.

"It's like the Wildcat Walk on wheels," he said.

The last issue Prieto and Bainter said they wanted to work on as president and vice president is a coalition initiative.

Prieto said the goal of this initiative is to promote groups and clubs on campus and link them with living organizations on and off campus. This way they can work together on planning university events.

"There has to be a way to work cohesively to structure event planning," Prieto said.

They also would like to tie in a course work program that would prepare students to be able to work in diverse work places after they graduate.

Prieto said he and Bainter are going to take a personable approach to their campaign. They are going to make a commitment to talk to as many people as they can because their issues are important to the students, he said.

"These are essential issues that we feel at least one person can take one of these issues and say 'Hey, that deals with me,'" Prieto said.

Funding contest canceled by education department

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many K-State faculty members agree the university has had a reputation for many years of successfully receiving funding for research projects that benefit the university and the community.

However, an important source of funding, the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education, recently has been canceled.

FIPSE, which is a chief sponsor of projects in higher education, had its comprehensive competition canceled by the Department of Education in January.

The competition allows for educators to submit proposals of project ideas that will benefit education and the community. The competition was going into the stage of selecting 200 applicants out of 1,700 to write a full proposal when it was canceled.

John Murray, interim associate vice-provost for research, said it was a surprise when the cancellation was announced to his office and faculty members that submitted proposals.

"These grants are designed to help faculty come up with innovative ways of teaching and learning at the college level," Murray said. "Without the grants, it will take away a main avenue for support of innovative teaching and learning."

Lori Bergen, assistant professor of journalism, said the reason why the competition was canceled was because of miscommunication between the Department of Education and Congress.

"The Department of Education misinterpreted from Congress its directive," Bergen said. "The department proceeded as usual, counting on similar amounts of money when Congress had a different focus in mind."

According to USA Today, Congress set aside more than half of FIPSE's $50 million budget for grants for 15 institutions. One of these grants is $6 million for the Robert J. Dole Institute for Public Service and Public Policy at the University of Kansas.

The Department of Education then was told to use the grant money to fund the specified projects. In doing so, the competition was canceled midway.

Bergen said canceling the program during the middle is like calling off a football game right before halftime.

"I was disappointed, because the Department of Education provides support for programs across the nation," Bergen said. "The competition is a good idea because support will come from the government and every project has a fair shake."

Sue Maes, senior development officer for the Regents Education Communication Center, said nine individuals or teams from K-State submitted pre-proposals to FIPSE this year. Maes said she thought Congress canceled the competition to benefit projects in its own areas.

"Congress has added to their authority by sponsoring projects that benefit their home areas," Maes said. "Then they required FIPSE to fund those projects."

Maes said the cancellation did not affect those in their second or third year of funding because once the money is given to an individual for a project, it is set aside for use.

Mary McElroy, professor of kinesiology, said she and Peter Nicholls, dean of arts and sciences, wrote a proposal dealing with mentoring for new women faculty members. Because of the competition's cancellation, the project will not be able to fulfill its purpose.

"This program is designed to learn on the job," McElroy said. "Now, 15 to 20 new faculty will not have the opportunity to participate and become better teachers and researchers."

Murray said he thinks the Department of Education will reinstate the competition in 2000 because of its dedication to new, beneficial projects.

"I think they will bring the program back next year because the department has a strong commitment to innovative projects," Murray said. "It is just a matter of convincing Congress."

Bergen helped write one proposal to try creating an opportunity to look at media literacy and develop a curriculum for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 to address new curriculum guidelines Kansas has for language arts.

Although one opportunity has been lost for funding, Bergen said she will continue to look for other ways to get the program up and running.

"We are always looking for support and looking at ways to alter the proposal to fit other funding competitions," Bergen said. "FIPSE is one opportunity for funding, but not the only one."

Murray said all FIPSE projects do what they can to enhance education.

"When the money is not there to develop curriculum and teaching goals, everyone loses," Murray said. "If they don't bring the competition back, we will be poorer for it."

Switzer sets example with service to others

The most remarkable aspect of Veryl Switzer, surprisingly, is not his career on the football field.

That in itself is a bold statement. While playing for the Wildcats, he was an All-American, led the nation in punt-return average and became the NFL's highest-drafted K-State player — a record he still holds.

But Switzer's legacy to K-State reaches beyond athletics. Even after his professional football career and work with the Chicago Board of Education, Switzer came back — first as an assistant football coach, then as associate dean for minority affairs. It seems his heart always has been in Manhattan.

It didn't stop there. He also created development programs for minority students at K-State, establishing the Upward Bound Program and the TRIO program.

His message, given by example, is that people can always do more good for the community and for themselves.

It's quite appropriate that Switzer be honored this week for his dedication to K-State. It's also fitting that he be honored during Black History Month, since the month is all about pioneers who made such a commitment to service.

Switzer has continually striven to educate and assist young people. His work sets an example not only for what athletes should be, but for what all K-State students and alumni should be.

The truth is not out there

Television fantasies debase their audience

As the fishing season quickly approaches, it gives pause to reminisce on the wonderful baiting going on in the entertainment industry. Yes, it is true. A large chunk of the TV viewing audience is being taken advantage of, hook, line and sinker, by TV shows that peddle fantastic plots for an unwitting and weak television audience.

The best and most cunning of these entertainers is the show "The X-Files."

What is plainly happening is that the creator of "The X-Files," Chris Carter, and his flock, are preying on the segment of society least able to defend itself from their fantastic stories.

"The X-Files" is a show revolving around some alien/government conspiracy theory, and, while most of the TV audience can move on and switch that channel every Sunday at 8 p.m., there are a poor few who cannot get past the mental hurdle associated with watching this basal form of entertainment.

These droids sit and absorb the countless fairy tales as if they were true, as if these improbable, circumstantial, hocus-pocus plots really could happen. It's an affront against its audience, which would be slightly better off watching "Teletubbies" reruns.

VIEWPOINT

The pointless plots of "The X-Files" hold no value whatsoever. The show relies on its audience not analyzing or dissecting what is going on. It gives fantastic stories in hopes that the viewer won't think about them. In other words, it rewards people for passivity in thought.

The show does attempt to give rational explanations to the initial pointless plot, yet one can rationalize the unscientific forever, and it won't make it any more true.

"The X-Files" makes money off of the kind of people who would say, "Yeah, well, I've never seen that ever happen before in my life, but that's not important, and it won't affect me." As long as they keep saying this, and the show keeps making money, then so will the average I.Q. of the nation slowly decline.

The reason for this is because the less these people analyze and poke and prod at what they experience, then the easier it will be to take advantage of them and trick them into believing anything they are told, so long as it is wrapped up and presented in a pretty little box called entertainment.

Other TV shows, while not directly presenting the most important issues of the day, at least indirectly involve issues which can be applied to one's life. "Friends," for example, while not aspiring to heights of intellectualism, at least indirectly presents relationship and lifestyle issues.

Likewise, shows such as "NYPD Blue" present social issues and stories about personal bravery and courage. These issues can help the viewer because they are realistic issues and they are applicable to the world around us.

"The X-Files" on the other hand, in all its inarticulate wonder, works only at presenting the issue of aliens, along with devil babies and ghost stories. While these are fine for the immature youth of a person, "The X-Files" 8 p.m. time slot and its mature-oriented characters aim directly at nurturing the semi-adult who cannot control their naivete.

What is needed here is a wake-up call to this Nielson cohort who refused to reject this lazy type of entertainment that is just as bad as "Dumb and Dumber." If one was so daring, it even could be described as a sort of intellectual juice-bar.

Whatever its appellation, the facts remain the same: "The X-Files" and its ilk perpetuate useless plots aimed only at feeding the romantic notions of a lost generation.

By switching the channel, these people will be forced to think for a change and to accept the reality they are trying so desperately to escape.

It will be an uncertain future when our plans and dreams are not curbed by the reality of the situation. As "The X-Files" keeps some people's heads in the clouds, our country's future rests on what can get done and not on what doesn't even exist.

What's important is realizing that the truth is not out there, undefined and vague, but the truth is what makes sense to everyone. The maxim of Occam's razor, which proclaimed that one should assume only the most rational explanations; has done Western civilization quite well in the past 700 years. There is no good reason to switch as of late.

To breach the schism between entertainment fantasy and rational reality, faith must be put in reason — not conspiracy theories.

Committee should rethink library fee decision

By supporting a tuition increase, senators do students a disservice

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

Student Governing Association leaders are caught in their own semantics.

The Privilege Fee Committee has voted down a proposed student privilege fee that would have funded the acquisition of resources for Hale Library. Without a miracle, such a fee won't be approved this year.

All because of one word. It began last year, when Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock proposed an 85-cent per-credit-hour student fee to help bring the library's resources more up to par with other schools in the Big 12 Conference. The committee defeated the fee proposal, and it was rejected again when reintroduced on the Senate floor.

Hobrock tried again this year, proposing a $1.70 per-credit-hour fee. That number — a bargaining chip by all accounts — eventually was lowered to about $1 per credit hour. The final proposal called for a three-year fee that started at $360,000 and increased for inflation each year.

The committee defeated that proposal, too, and didn't even allow the bill to go before the full Senate.

Again, one word made the difference. Many committee members and senators balked at the idea of a student privilege fee to fund the library. The library, they said, isn't a privilege.

Privilege. Nine letters stood between mindless chatter about a campus issue and an actual solution.

For the second straight year, the Privilege Fee Committee has kept a library fee from becoming reality. Last year, it worried that students would be bearing the brunt of library funding without help from other sources. So, Hobrock and administrators delivered. This year's proposal included funds from the state, KSU Foundation, the faculty and endowed gifts to the library. That promise delivered, committee members were left to find another reason to reject the proposal.

After the committee expressed concern over the $1.70 proposal, Hobrock lowered his request to $360,000 — or about $1 per credit hour. The committee defeated that as well. The reason? How could it approve a "privilege" fee for something that isn't a "privilege" at all?

Committee members are right; the library isn't a privilege. But by rejecting the student-fee bill for that reason, they did their constituents and future generations of students a great disservice.

True, students should expect a library to be included in the tuition costs they pay every semester. Yes, they should expect it to be full of books and other materials. This isn't a perfect world, though. K-State's library system has lagged behind others in the Big 12 for years, and it's been no secret that it will take several million dollars to bring it back up to par. Students should play a role in stocking Hale's shelves if the state, Foundation and other funding sources are chipping in as well.

More than a year later and with the library a few hundred-thousand dollars short, student leaders now claim to have the answer. They propose a tuition increase that would be earmarked specially for the library. The increase could come in the form of a matching program, in which the state would contribute a certain amount of money for each dollar paid by students. It also could be a flat fee imposed each semester.

Here's why neither of those will work:

■ Timing. The library has fallen behind its peers for years, and inflation continues to make it hard to keep resources on hand. If senators set their mind to it, they could pass a fee in time for it to take effect next fall, providing money for the library as soon as possible. (Never mind the fact they could have passed the fee last month, making all this easy.) The earliest a tuition increase could be put in place would be August 2000.

■ Coordinating. Associate Vice President for Administration and Finance Tom Schellhardt said K-State's tuition is now the same as the University of Kansas and slightly higher than Wichita State University. The levels are kept the same because all three schools are research institutions and compete for students, he said, and administrators would want KU and WSU to adopt a library increase to keep tuition levels the same. That means a library increase would have to be proposed so it would benefit all three schools, and all three would have to agree to it before it would be considered by the Kansas Board of Regents.

■ Bureaucracy. A library tuition increase could fall through numerous administrative cracks before becoming reality. After being approved by WSU and KU, the proposal would advance to a regents subcommittee, then the regents, then to Gov. Bill Graves as part of the state budget and then the Kansas Legislature. Any of those entities could decide against the increase or change the wording to suit its liking, regardless of whether the change was in K-State students' best interest.

■ Local control. If students passed a fee

True, most students would rather not pay a privilege fee to fund Hale. But, even more students are tired of hearing empty rhetoric from student leaders who say they want to fix the problem but fail to present viable solutions.

to fund the library, they could establish a committee to set guidelines for what the money would buy and review those purchases whenever they wanted. A tuition increase, however, wouldn't guarantee what the library would use the money for. Thus, undergraduate students could pay higher tuition to fund resources for graduate students and faculty.

■ Pay now, pay always. Hobrock proposed a three-year fee. While there's no guarantee the fee ever would be taken off the university rolls, those are still better odds than with a tuition increase. As Provost James Coffman said, if tuition goes up to fund the library, "it won't come back down."

At its meeting Sunday, the committee moved to hold any further action on library budget requests after discussion on whether the library is a "privilege." Business Sen. Nick Mueeting, quoted in a story in Monday's Collegian, spoke for the crowd.

"A privilege fee is not the proper place for a request if it is essential to the success of the university," Mueeting said. "Money is money, whether it is a privilege fee or tuition increase. The point we need to make during the bill is whether or not this is a privilege fee."

Mueeting makes my point. Money is money. Student senators, who claim to want to know what their constituents want, should realize the obvious: Students don't care what it's called. They'll be paying for it one way or the other.

True, most students would rather not pay a privilege fee to fund Hale. But, even more students are tired of hearing empty rhetoric from student leaders who say they want to fix the problem but fail to present viable solutions.

Administrators have done their part. It's time for senators and Privilege Fee Committee members to ante up.

Shades of Bert and Ernie. The shockwaves elicited by the latest exposure of moral corruption among the Hollywood animated elite is still reverberating. Tinky Winky, the most prominent of the Teletubbies, has been rooted out of the closet and exposed in all his homosexual grandeur by none other than that expert on queer issues, the

As the nation reels in shock, it only can be said that in retrospect, the cues were obvious. The purple fur. The triangle. The "magic bag." Are these the trappings of a lifestyle acceptable to today's God-fearing Christian? Or are they indicative of the gay agenda's unacknowledged intention to indoctrinate our youth at the earliest possible age?

What more surprises await us from this otherwise execrable example of British children's television? Do Dipsy, bedecked in masculine green and prominent phallic head adornment, and Po, awash in illicit scarlet, evoke the prurient interests of our nation's youth? Is Laa-Laa, curly Q on forehead, a little more than an advertisement for Viagra?

Then again, perhaps the relevant question is why should anyone give a damn. Leaving aside the issue of what latent urges might drive Falwell's paranoia to delusional visions of queerness (or even sexuality) emanating from children's television, what is it about the concept of homosexuality that fosters among the religious right this appetite for such ridiculous pronouncements as Falwell's diagnoses of hidden sexual orientation among the Teletubbies?

After all, this goes far beyond the adolescent unease with a crowded locker room. The paragon of the religious right are not merely issuing a mild chastisement on the proper vows of marriage. Rather, what we are witness to is a degree of fascination among these self-styled moral digni-ties for all things even remotely sexual that would make even the most dedicated swinger say, "Whoa there — time for that cold shower."

What do they get out of it? The only answer that comes to mind is that for the cross-wielding demagogue, preaching against homosexuality has become the drug of choice. A pinch in each prayer on Sunday morning television and donations from Mr. and Mrs. J. Uptight come rolling in, in valiant defense of God, country, and apple pie.

All they need is a bit of social anxiety and a good scapegoat — ideally one that can't fight back — and they're on that gilt-edged road to the Rolls, the Rolex and the pocket full of congressmen. Composing only about 2 percent of the population and already exiled to the closets of society, gays, lesbians and bisexuals make the perfect target. After all, they could be anywhere. They could be your neighbor. They could be your teacher. It's a wonder how the Falwells of the world sleep at night.

What's needed is a good injection of that methadone of irrational thought — perspective. So gays and lesbians get married. Big deal. You'll still be married and paying all those extra taxes. So they have or adopt children — at least they'll be wanted children, which is more than many heterosexuals can lay claim to. So they could be your gym coach or, heaven forbid, your Boy Scout leader. Don't worry folks — it's not contagious. Homosexuality outlawed in Leviticus? Maybe you should reread the Pentateuch — if you're not a male Hebrew sheepherder, it hasn't got anything good to say about you.

So what will happen if homosexuality becomes accepted? God still will be God. Mom still will be Mom, and apple pie still will come from the bakery section of Dillons. Sure there are problems in society, but maybe it's time for some real solutions, requiring a bit of thought and an absence of hate-mongering, scapegoating and demagoguery.

It sure beats watching "Teletubbies."

KANSAS LEGISLATURE

Proposed bill would affect students with guns, drugs

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Students who bring a weapon or drugs to school face expulsion.

Gov. Bill Graves said he wants to make the punishment even tougher for those students by hitting them where they are most likely to feel it — their wheels.

An attorney for the governor's office asked the House Education Committee on Wednesday to endorse two juvenile crime bills.

One bill would suspend a student's driver's license for a year if the student is expelled or suspended from school for bringing a weapon or drugs to school or a school activity. It would also suspend a license if the pupil's behavior at school or a school activity resulted in, or was likely to result in, serious injury to others.

The other bill would permit a juvenile who brings a weapon to school or a school activity to be detained for up to three days and receive a psychological evaluation.

Natalie Haag, the governor's attorney, said a driver's license is a privilege rather than a right, and the license-suspension bill would have a strong effect on juveniles.

"We look at it as hitting kids where they think," Haag said after the hearing.

"That may be the one thing that makes them think about taking that knife to school."

Under the bill, if a juvenile offender was younger than the driving age, that person's driving privileges would be revoked for a year after reaching the legal age.

Law-enforcement officials and educators were among those who spoke in favor of the bill allowing the detainment of a juvenile who brings a weapon to school.

"You bring a weapon to school, let's figure out why," Attorney General Carla Stovall said. "The idea is that we'd be proactive."

Tony Woollen, a school resource officer for the Leawood Police Department, relayed a story about a shy sixth-grader named Ethan. A bully placed a knife against Ethan's throat on the school bus one morning.

"Though Ethan is an introvert, he is still a person, a person with rights," Woollen said.

Woollen said the bill would help prevent the bully from returning to do harm, and it would act as a deterrent against other students bringing weapons to school.

Stovall said she would like to amend a section of the bill to require law enforcement officers to take a juvenile into custody if they have probable cause to believe the juvenile brought a weapon to school or a school activity. The bill now states an officer can take a juvenile into custody, but it does not mandate this action.

Education Chairman Ralph Tanner, R-Baldwin City, said he expects the committee to vote Monday on the two bills, and a measure that would broaden the definition of weapon in the Weapon-Free Schools Act.

Tanner also said the committee might amend the detainment bill to include the language Stovall suggested.

Vehicle tax plan struck from tax-relief bill

■ Graves to propose new, reduced version of vehicle property tax cut.

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves' plan to phase out the property tax on vehicles was swept from the table Wednesday by the House Taxation Committee as it narrowed options for what to include in a tax-relief bill it will send to the House for debate.

Before the committee puts its final stamp on the plan, a reduced version of Graves' vehicle tax plan might be back on the table after the governor's office talks to some of its members.

"All things are possible, but I see this as the package the committee will recommend," Chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, said.

"The absence of a car tax (component) will be of concern to the governor."

The committee's tentative proposal would cost some $680 million over five years, compared to a $560 million reduction in state revenue under the governor's plan.

Whatever the committee sends to the chamber will be amended before being dispatched to the Senate.

The final version will be crafted by House and Senate negotiators late in the session.

Adkins said Graves' vehicle tax proposal — a cornerstone of his re-election campaign — might have fallen victim to his ambitious transportation improvement plan.

"More money for transportation while cutting the car tax isn't really connected, but the perception is they go together," Adkins said. "The problem is trying to explain to voters why cut taxes when talking about a highway plan."

The committee kept the rest of the governor's tax relief package intact: eliminating the oil severance tax, increasing income tax credits on property taxes for business machinery and equipment, doubling income tax credits for people who adopt, and sales tax credits for improving grain elevators and short line railroads.

The idea of reducing the 4.9-percent state sales tax on groceries was rejected by the committee.

Instead, the panel expanded the food sales tax rebate program that gives people a credit against their state income tax debt.

Also added to the mix was cutting the statewide school mill levy rate from 20 to 18 and a state income tax credit for parents of children under age 16, plus eliminating the sales tax on commercial remodeling and other minor sales tax relief.

Much of the committee discussion centered on what it could do, given the uncertainty of a highway improvement plan considered by lawmakers.

Because of that uncertainty, some committee members argued for keeping the tax relief as small as possible on the theory that it will be loaded with amendments on the House floor.

"The problem is we don't know how big the highway bill will be," Rep. Dave Gregory, R-Wichita, said.

"I think the responsible thing is to come out with a modest tax package."

Funding would boost research of Gulf War illness

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — After hearing emotional testimony from veterans and physicians, the House Federal and State Affairs Committee unanimously endorsed on Wednesday a resolution calling for more funding to research Gulf War illness.

The resolution, which does not carry the force of law, urges President Clinton and Congress to provide funding for research independent of the U.S. Defense and Veterans Affairs departments.

The resolution, which went to the House for debate, also calls on the governor and heads of several state agencies to investigate the illness and promote programs to inform and assist veterans and family members suffering from the illness.

Thousands of Gulf War veterans have suffered from such problems as chronic fatigue, frequent diarrhea, aching joints, memory lapses, headaches, rashes and abdominal pain.

"I hate living like this," said Kenneth Rogers Sr., a Gulf War veteran whose afflictions include memory loss, chronic fatigue, degenerative joint disease and bleeding gums and sinuses.

Lea Steele, an epidemiologist who is coordinating the Kansas Persian Gulf War Veterans Health Initiative Project, said 30 percent of the 2,000 Kansas Gulf War veterans surveyed during the past year are affected by the illness.

Thousands of Gulf War veterans have suffered from such problems as chronic fatigue, frequent diarrhea, aching joints, memory lapses, headaches, rashes and abdominal pain.

Gulf War veteran Hugh Grossman III said he thinks the disease is contagious because his wife and stepchildren have similar symptoms.

Many veterans said they think the government has withheld the truth about the illness.

"I am still waiting for the true answers from the federal government as to what really happened to us," Rogers said.

Rep. Daniel Thimesch, D-Cheney, who sponsored the resolution, said the resolution calls for research funding independent of the Defense and Veterans Affairs departments in order to avoid accepting money with strings attached.

The House is expected to pass the resolution easily, sending it to the Senate.

In addition to Thimesch, 96 House members have signed the resolution. Only 63 members would have to approve the resolution to send it to the Senate.

Thimesch said Sen. Larry Salmans, R-Hanston, would carry the resolution in the Senate.

Switzer's community service focuses on youth

By JON BALMER and RICH SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Veryl Switzer said athletics always came easy to him.

From his time as a punishing running back in K-State's backfield to his continued gridiron success as a Green Bay Packer, Switzer's powerful style helped etch his name in fans' memories and earn him a spot in the Kansas Sports Hall of Fame.

Despite these athletic feats, Switzer said he knew he had a higher calling once it was time to put up the cleats. His desire to lend a helping hand to anybody in need led him to a common starting point: public schools. And after more than four decades of service spent assisting and developing youth, Switzer's community work is just as recognized as his play at Memorial Stadium.

A significant player in the development of programs for minority students at K-State, Switzer's work included establishing the Upward Bound Program and TRIO program with friend Reggie McGowan. Now the director of education and personal development, McGowan said Switzer's effectiveness with youth stems from his true compassion and desire to see them succeed in life.

SWITZER

"I think when Veryl communicates and he articulates his concern with youth," he said, "They can pick up instinctively that this is not only an adult who's trying to tell me what to do, but this is someone who loves me, who cares about me, and really wants the best for me."

This earnest and straight-forward approach Switzer offers has established a trust that has continued to increase over the 30 years he has worked at K-State. Although involved in numerous activities and programs, Switzer has never let his position interfere with his involvement with youth.

"Kids may see him at the mall or at a basketball game," McGowan said. "They know he's a very busy man, but he's very accessible. He's always opened his door and offered his phone number to them, and they know, if they need him, how to get a hold of him."

Switzer's involvement in the community hasn't been limited to the Manhattan area, however. A native of Nicodemus, Kan., Switzer has remained a fixture in the town, caring for his family's farm and maintaining a steady hand in events and programs.

"In the community, he's into all facets," said Wallace Kidd, one of the first African-Americans to graduate from K-State and a friend of Switzer for more than 50 years. "Just about everything that goes on, he's had a hand in."

Juggling a busy schedule has never been a problem for Switzer. Between his hours invested in Nicodemus and his official position as assistant to the director for department relations in the athletic department, Switzer's biggest concern has remained helping individuals just starting out in life.

President Jon Wefald, the man responsible for declaring this week in Switzer's honor, said Switzer's biggest asset to K-State has been providing guidance and leadership.

"He's a role model for minority students, especially African-Americans, whether they're student-athletes or just students," Wefald said. "He definitely enjoys working with students, and I think he provides excellent council and advice and he's always there when they need help."

The steady hand of friendship and understanding Switzer has extended over the years has transcended his weighty reputation on the field in the hearts of many. Still planning to remain involved in youth-oriented areas following his retirement from the athletic department, McGowan said Switzer's concern for the young originates from an early lesson in the power of involvement.

"I think Veryl can relate a lot of these kids to himself," he said. "Veryl accredited a lot of his success to one individual while he was a sophomore or junior in high school, who really took an interest in him, and who really mentored him and who Veryl thought really genuinely cared about him."

"I think that has transformed Veryl into understanding how many times the things that he can say or that he can do can really transform the life of another kid."

Free throws hurt Cats in 3-point loss to CU

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team went ice cold from the free-throw line in the final minutes of the Colorado game Wednesday night. The Cats missed six consecutive foul shots in the game's final three minutes, losing 57-54.

"Offensively we didn't execute well, and we didn't hit foul shots," K-State Coach Deb Patterson said.

The Cats committed 17 turnovers and shot 31 percent. Patterson said numbers like that make it difficult to win in the Big 12 Conference.

"They stepped up and made plays, and we didn't," Patterson said. "It's tough to win in this league when you only have nine assists and commit 17 turnovers."

Forward Nicky Ramage said the team was dejected after the loss.

"The word for the night is depressing," Ramage said. "We had chances, and we got ahead and then fell behind."

The Cats, now 6-7 in conference play and 13-10 overall, expected Colorado come out focused after its game two weeks ago, a game K-State had managed to win in the game's final seconds. The Buffaloes are now 6-7 in conference play and 13-10 overall.

Early in the first half, K-State was unable to find an answer to the Buffaloes' Britt Hartshorn. Hartshorn led the Buffaloes to an early lead, scoring six of the team's first nine points and finishing the game with 14 points.

The Cats faced full-court pressure throughout the first half.

Olga Firsova led the Cats in scoring in the first half but was forced sit down with eight minutes to go in the half due to foul trouble.

Firsova said she needs to improve her style of defense.

"I don't know, I just have to move my feet on defense," Firsova said.

Firsova wasn't the only K-State player in early foul trouble as guard Essence Perry and forward Nicky Ramage each picked up three personal fouls.

Patterson said the foul trouble

Cats fall, again, to struggling Hawks

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another "Sunflower Showdown" later, the K-State Wildcats are still left looking for a win against rival Kansas Jayhawks as they were dropped 62-47 at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

Despite a late Cat surge powered by three-pointers from Ayome May and Josh Reid with 3:51 left in the game, the late perimeter misses by the Cats ended any hope of knocking off KU in the Hawks' house.

After a closely played first 15 minutes in which the Cats had the lead on five occasions, Jayhawk Jeff Boschee unloaded for 10 of his 13 total points to fuel a 16-2 run in a five-minute span to give the Hawks a 31-24 lead at the half.

"He played very well," K-State guard May said of Boschee. "I think he was the key factor in the first half. Boschee just did his thing tonight."

K-State came out shooting to start the second half, with Shawn Rhodes and Cortez Groves getting quick jumpers. Senior point guard Chris Griffin pulled the Cats within five after getting fouled on a shot in the lane and making his free throw to complete the old fashioned three-point play.

The Hawks quickly struck back despite the scare put on by the Cats' 7-0 opening run. KU's Ryan Robertson nailed a jump shot and later a three-point bucket to ignite a 10-5 run that included baskets by Lester Earl and Marlon London and a trey by Kenny Gregory.

K-State senior Manny Dies, who has never beaten KU in his time at K-State, said in order to defeat the Hawks, K-State needs to be the aggressor, especially in a game he thought the Cats could

Yes, students, K-State has a baseball team even fair-weather fans can get excited about

VITTI

The following is an actual conversation I had with a stupid person whose identity shall remain secret:

Me: Hey, how's it going? Did you go to the game on Tuesday?

Person: What game?

Me: The baseball game. It was the home opener.

Person: We have a baseball team?

At that point I thought about reaching for my deluxe Swiss Army knife, thinking about all the ways I could torture that person with the corkscrew, the plastic toothpick, the nail file, etc. Reason, however, got the best of me.

After all, the only thing I would kill someone for is a guarantee K-State could win a national title in every scholarship and club sport every year — I think it would be worth it.

Back to the matter at hand: K-State has a baseball team.

A very good baseball team.

A baseball team that fair-weather fans will be chatting about a few years down the road.

It's true. If you don't believe me, why don't you take a trip out to the Eisenhower Baseball Complex this weekend and take a gander at what will be one of the best teams in the nation — in a couple of years.

By looking at the Wildcat's record, this might not be obvious. A record of 2-5 is hardly an indication of just how talented the team is this year and of the potential the team possesses for the future.

The Cats have faced some pretty stiff competition this year: three games against the 11th best team in the nation, and two games against a team on the verge of breaking into the top 25 — that's not a K-State football pre-conference schedule.

To say the Cats have been disappointing so far in the season would be preposterous. In actuality, the biggest disappointment so far this season is quite obvious after only one home game: K-State fans.

Where are they?

I'm not exactly sure, but they weren't at the Wildcats home opener — that much I am certain. What doesn't make sense to me, is that the Kansas City Royals can draw a crowd of at least 30,000 on opening day when everybody knows they will suck all year, but the K-State baseball team barely was able to draw more than 30 people on Tuesday to watch a team that could, if things break the right way, win the Big 12 title.

I guess we all don't live our lives according to logic.

Here's why K-State will be good this year, and in the future:

1. Senior outfielder Quinn Cravens: This guy tore it up while playing semi-pro ball last summer for the National Baseball Conference champions, the El Dorado Broncos. He hit nine homers last year after struggling at the plate early in the season, and this year he could at least double that amount. He also hit .294 with 32 RBIs, and those totals should increase as well.

2. The excellent pitching staff: The starters in particular should be the backbone of this team, although they have struggled early. A rotation of seniors Brandon Peck and Derek Andersen, junior Jason Wells, and possibly freshman Blake Johnson could be among the Big 12's best.

3. The incredible freshman class: In the season opener, the Cats started three freshmen in the field, and several others have a chance to make a significant contribution. So far, third baseman Brett Reid is hitting .316 and outfielder Kasey Weishaar is not far behind at .313. Toss in catcher Tim Doty, outfielder Collin Yoachim, shortstop Kyle Boyer and pitchers Blake Johnson and Chad Duckers, and head coach Mike Clark has a foundation to build upon for the next four years.

4. The return of senior closer/outfielder Andy Silva and junior third baseman Travis Andre: Both would be leaders of this team if they were playing. Silva was an All-Big 12 pick last year as a closer and wasn't too shabby from the plate either, hitting .291 and scoring 38 runs. Andre was a stud at national power Florida before transferring to K-State. He hit .313 in his last season with the Gators and led them in hitting during regionals that year, going 6-15 in the tournament.

Both should be back midway through the season.

5. The new Frank Myers Field: When the stadium is completed over the summer, Manhattan residents will have one of the finest stadiums in college baseball to watch games in. The same firm that designed Camden Yards designed this stadium. It will be a fabulous place to watch the Cats in the future and it should lure even more talented players to the Wildcat program.

There. See now why my panties are in a bunch? If not, let me know and I'll take one of the baseball team's nice, shiny aluminum bats and club you over the head.

It's time to get out and support your K-State Wildcat baseball team. They'll win with or without you, but I'm sure they'd much rather have you there to cheer them on. Wouldn't you like that too?

Sunday bowling leagues let students strike out boring nights

By PAM LEWIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is Sunday evening, and the last-minute homework is finished. Andy Rooney just concluded "60 Minutes," and the Amy Fisher story is being replayed as the featured Sunday-night movie.

If this scenario sounds familiar, then being involved in a bowling league can help with the mundane Sunday evening, Ryan Kaiser, junior in economics, said.

Kaiser said he brings life to his Sundays by bowling at the K-State Student Union Recreation Center.

Kaiser is a member of a coed team that bowls in a league every Sunday evening in the basement of the Union.

"This is my first semester to participate in the league," Kaiser said. "I bowled in the intramural tournament for my fraternity, and I bowled a 213. A friend saw my lucky game and talked me into joining a league with him."

The bowling leagues are offered each semester for K-State students, faculty and the public. There are four people per team, and participants can sign up as a team or individually. The league categories are coed, men, women and faculty. However, this semester lacks an all-women's league.

"We have had women's leagues in the past, and we will continue them in the future if there is an interest," said Terri Eddy, recreation manager for the Union. "The mixed leagues are just more popular now."

Brenda Morgan, former K-State student and coed bowling league participant, said she quit playing because she recently had a child. Morgan said, however, that she would like to participate in the future when she has more free time.

Morgan said she thought the reason she was the only woman on her team was because of a lack of advertising by the league.

"I was the only girl on the team, but there was never a majority of women in the leagues," Morgan said. "It may be because it is not advertised well. I didn't know about the league until a friend from work told me."

Each participant is billed for the entire amount of the league. The league runs for 14 weeks, and the cost ranges anywhere from $4.20 to $5.50 per week, depending on what league participants want. Each league votes on whether they want to be sanctioned and how much they want to spend on trophies and awards.

League participants can pay weekly, monthly or all at once. The lowest rate for a non-sanctioned league is $62.86, Eddy said, and league fees are flexible as long as an attempt is made to pay monthly.

"We try to cater to the students' needs," Eddy said. "Leagues are the bread and butter of the bowling business. They pay the bills."

League fees include shoe rentals, discounts and incentives. League participants can open bowl for $1 during the week. The cost for non-league students is $1.40 per game before 6 p.m. Monday through Thursday.

Other incentives for league participants include free soft drinks and games when they bowl three strikes in a row. If a strike is bowled in the third, sixth or ninth frame they receive a free Subway sandwich.

Incentives for non-league bowlers, meanwhile, include $1 beer draws on Monday night and a different atmosphere than most commercial bowling alleys, Eddy said. The Union's bowling alley is smoke-free.

Leagues are scheduled in the evenings Sunday through Thursday. If lanes permit, every day is open to the public.

Kaiser said that even if one chooses not to become involved in an organized bowling league, the Union proves to be a valuable resource for bowlers of all kinds.

"Leagues are not for everyone," Kaiser said. "Some people like to bowl every once in a while. The Union is great for that."

Musical features famous faces

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fans of comedian Rip Taylor now can see him come to Manhattan in the starring role of Pseudolus in the Tony Award-winning musical comedy, "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum."

The musical will be performed at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said the story line has its origins in Latin literature.

"A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum" is based on the Latin writings of Plautus," Martin said.

"Forum" tells the story of a slave named Pseudolus who tries to gain his freedom by attracting a beautiful but not so intelligent woman for his master.

"It is a very clever and funny show," Martin said. "It's a well crafted piece of entertainment."

"A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum" is written by Burt Shevelove and Larry Gelbart, and Martin said individuals will recognize Gelbart as the writer of the TV show "M*A*S*H."

Its composer and lyricist, Steven Sondheim, also wrote the lyrics for musicals such as "Gypsy" and "West Side Story," Martin said.

Martin said another well-known name was slated to appear in the production.

Actress and comedian Jo Anne Worley, who starred in the variety show "Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In," which ran from the late 1960s to the early 1970s, was scheduled to appear in "Forum." Martin said Worley decided not to make an appearance in the production because of an argument she had with her management about taking her pet dogs on the road with her during the tour.

Jennifer Nash, senior in mass communications and publications manager for McCain, said in addition to Taylor, many famous comedians such as Nathan Lane and Whoopi Goldberg have taken turns playing Pseudolus in the revival of the musical.

Still, Nash said, audiences will recognize Taylor.

"Rip Taylor has made several appearances on 'The Ed Sullivan Show,' 'The Tonight Show' and other variety shows," Nash said.

Nash said "Forum" can be classified as a comedy and a romance as well as a musical.

"There's a whole bunch of different stories going on at one time in this musical," she said. "The audience will be entertained."

Martin said, however, the production is not intended to be for all ages because younger children might not understand the humor or get as much out of it as individuals who are high school age or older.

"It has a lot of hijinks that people associate with good, light musical comedy," he said.

The musical is one performance Martin said K-State students should not miss.

"It's something college students should have in their repertoire," Martin said.

Nash said it should be an enjoyable experience for all who get the opportunity to see the production.

"It will be a good, fun evening for the audience," she said.

Iowa band returns to Manhattan upon request

By CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A taste of Iowa's rock-music scene will be featured in Aggieville tonight.

House of Large Sizes, a power-pop band from Cedar Falls, Iowa, will perform at 10:30 tonight at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville. Admission to the event is free and open to the public.

The band has played in Manhattan on several occasions in the past, and it is a favorite in the area, said Steve Anthony, promoter of shows at Rusty's.

"I'm under pressure from local musicians begging me to bring them back," Anthony said.

Anthony said many local bands even cover some of the songs written by House of Large Sizes.

The band previously has appeared at two of KSDB-FM 91.9's welcome back concerts, as well as performing twice at Rusty's.

From what he has seen of previous performances by House of Large Sizes, Anthony said he is sure the band will put on a high-energy concert.

"They are real fun," Anthony said. "The incredible live stage performance really makes them what they are."

In addition, Sandoval, a roots-rock band from Kansas City, Mo., will open for House of Large Sizes. It also receives a lot of support both in Manhattan and in Kansas City, Anthony said.

"Sandoval is up-and-coming in the area," Anthony said. "They are really popular in Kansas City."

Sandoval will release a new album next month. In conjunction with the event, Rusty's will be host to a Compact Disc release party for the band in late March or April, Anthony said.

Due to the popularity of the bands, Anthony said he predicted a large turnout at the event.

"You'd be a fool not to see this show," Anthony said.

Colorado hosts BSU conference

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colorado is offering more than snow and ski slopes this weekend.

A Big 12 Black Student Union conference at the University of Colorado will offer workshops, speakers and a career fair to help students deal with college life and life after graduation. There also will be a step and dance show and a gospel extravaganza.

More than 60 people will go to Boulder, Colo., to attend workshops about self-improvement, time-management skills, police brutality and pressures on a predominantly white campus, said Paris Rossiter, sophomore in general engineering and chair of the Freshman Action Team.

Rossiter said anyone who wants to attend is welcome. He went to the conference when he was a senior in high school.

"I remembered how professional everyone was," he said. "I thought it was going to be a big party, but it's a whole networking opportunity."

Brandi Nelson, sophomore in environmental engineering, said it is also an opportunity to express her frustration.

"We still have a lot of things to overcome as black people, such as becoming more unified and fighting stereotypes and racism," Nelson said. "An example of this is the DB92 debate. It's not just a black or white thing, but it's definitely part of it."

CU began preparing for this event more than a year ago. Rossiter said the conference usually goes on without any problem, although there are some people who arrive late or don't attend all the workshops.

As a student, Rossiter said he likes meeting people who have the same goals as he does — establishing themselves in life.

"It gives you a new perspective on why you're here, on what you want to do when you finish school," he said.

Dawnielle Robinson, coordinator of the Multicultural Organization, said that at the conference, she has learned creative ways to get students involved. She said she is planning to revive the Multicultural Student Council this year.

"That's the biggest thing on my plate this year — to improve communication and involvement," Robinson said. "I also get a renewed sense of leadership development. I go primarily to network with other administrators and how we can have a better environment for the African-American students."

There is a conference each year during the third week of February. The Big 12 Council, which consists of BSU representatives from each Big 12 university, meets four times each year to decide which university should be host to the conference. K-State was the site of the conference in 1996.

Rossiter said K-State wants to bring a positive attitude and positive role models to the conference.

"It's really a time to see the students interact with Black Student Union organizations," Robinson said. "It's like a period of rejuvenation, of getting back to the basics."

HEALING broken BONES

Russian technique makes its way to the U.S.

By JESSICA THOMAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Patients often give a sigh of relief when a new treatment for broken limbs is discovered.

In this case, the patients are animals, and the sigh of relief is coming from a canine.

All the excitement is about a new method of repairing injured limbs that recently was applied to a patient at the College of Veterinary Medicine for the first time at K-State.

The Ilizarov method, which utilizes external fixation rather than under-the-skin fixation, was introduced only recently to the United States, but has been practiced in Europe since the '40s or '50s, said Christina Gerdes, fourth-year student in veterinary medicine.

The patient is Jesse Nielsen, a 3-year-old Australian shepherd mix from Nebraska. Jesse was hit by a car, which resulted in fractured bones in the thoracic limb of her right front leg.

Her left front leg was paralyzed, so she needed the other leg to heal in order to walk.

Jesse's veterinarian referred her owner to K-State because of the college's reputation of having excellent orthopedic surgery care.

Gerdes said the Ilizarov method utilizes special wires through the bone that are attached to a circle fixator that encompasses the leg. This allows for more support and stability, which is just what Jesse needed.

Dr. James Roush, veterinary orthopedic surgeon, said that the procedure is named after the Russian doctor who pioneered it. Roush said there is a story that an Italian surgeon in the '70s or '80s broke his leg while skiing, but the break never healed. After several failed attempts to fix it, the man visited a doctor in Russia. The procedure worked, and the Italian doctor spread the news to other European countries.

Roush said the United States' unfamiliarity with the procedure is most likely due to the lack of information coming out of the Soviet Union during the Cold War.

In the United States, the procedure has been used on children with growth problems such as scoliosis or curvature of the spine and to help with angular limb deformities.

"The advantage this procedure is that we can get a grip on small segments of bone that were difficult to grip with other appliances," Roush said.

The procedure on Jesse took about three hours, but Roush said it won't take as long when they start using this method more often.

The Ilizarov method won't be used to treat every limb injury, but in Jesse's case, it was the only solution. Gerdes said the break was so far down on her leg that it was not amenable to regular methods.

While this procedure requires different expertise than the regular methods, Roush said that it is not necessarily more expensive and requires about the same amount of time to heal, which he estimated at about 8-12 weeks.

Jesse is doing well, Gerdes said, and will be discharged this morning.

IVAN KOZAR/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Guards kill Kurdish protestors

By COLLEEN BARRY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BERLIN — Israeli security guards shot and killed three Kurds who forced their way into the Israeli consulate Wednesday with dozens of protesters enraged by reports that Israel aided in the arrest of the foremost Kurdish rebel leader.

Turkish officials released a videotape of their captive, Abdullah Ocalan, including footage showing him handcuffed and sweating, his eyes taped shut. Officials said he was being interrogated in an island prison and promised a fair trial but refused to allow three of his foreign attorneys into Turkey.

In Berlin, as many as 100 demonstrators — some brandishing clubs and iron bars — pummeled their way past 30 German police officers sent to the Israeli consulate 30 minutes earlier after officials received reports that Kurds planned to take the building, police chief Hagen Saberschinsky said.

The Kurds climbed a fence surrounding the four-story white building and broke through the door. A man and a woman were shot to death in the consulate's foyer, and another man was shot in a stairwell, Saberschinsky said.

Nine Kurds barricaded themselves inside one room, briefly taking a female consular employee hostage.

At least 43 people were injured, including 16 demonstrators and 27 police officers. Police said they arrested 220 Kurds — 45 at the consulate and the remainder at demonstrations after the shootings.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reiterated that Israel had no role in Ocalan's arrest and defended the shootings, saying the guards acted in self-defense.

Israel had put its diplomatic missions on alert earlier after a news report claimed that Israel's Mossad intelligence agency helped Turkey track Ocalan.

The violence in Berlin — the worst in two days of protests over the 49-year-old rebel leader's arrest — brought warnings for Germany's half-million Kurds to curb their outrage.

Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said Germany would "not tolerate having political conflicts from foreign countries carried over into German streets." Interior Minister Otto Schily threatened to deport Kurds involved in violent protests.

Ocalan (pronounced OH'-jah-lahn) and his guerrillas have waged a 14-year war for Kurdish autonomy in southeastern Turkey. Almost 37,000 people have died in the conflict. He could face the death penalty.

Kurds began seizing Greek diplomatic posts across Europe early Tuesday after learning of Ocalan's capture in Kenya, where he had been hiding at the Greek ambassador's residence in Nairobi.

Many of the demonstrations ended Wednesday. About 40 protesters held a clerk hostage in the Greek Embassy in London and announced they were beginning a hunger strike, police said. Occupations also continued at the offices of political parties in Sweden and Austria.

A standoff in Hamburg, Germany, ended when the Kurds released a hostage and departed. Several were arrested.

Also Wednesday, the U.S. State Department warned that Kurdish violence could extend to American interests and urged U.S. citizens traveling or living abroad to review their personal security.

Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit said four or five Turkish commandos, a pilot and a doctor took part in the covert operation that brought Ocalan back to Turkey. The nucleus of the special commando force was trained by Green Berets and other American instructors.

Kosovo talks continue under NATO's watch

By JEFFREY ULBRICH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMBOUILLET, France — Despite Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic's defiant "no" to the chief mediator at the Kosovo peace talks, the British and French foreign ministers said Wednesday they detected some progress.

With less than three days to go to the Saturday noon deadline for reaching a three-year interim agreement between Serbs and Kosovo Albanians, the United States ordered an additional 51 American warplanes to Europe for possible airstrikes against Serbia if an agreement is not reached this weekend.

Secretary of Defense William Cohen signed an order directing 12 Air Force F-117 stealth fighter-bombers, 10 Navy EA-6B electronic warfare planes and 29 refueling planes now in the United States to a base in Europe.

Cohen's order followed another warning Wednesday from the Clinton administration to Milosevic that the Serbs face swift and severe consequences if they persist in rejecting a NATO peacekeeping force in Kosovo.

Demanding that Milosevic change his mind by noon Saturday, James P. Foley, a State Department spokesman, said, "If it would take some military action to force Mr. Milosevic to his senses, so be it."

The additional planes bring to 260 the number of U.S. aircraft that would be available for any NATO strikes against Serbia, a Defense Department spokesman said. Additional U.S. aircraft, including bombers, have been ordered to a standby position in case they are needed, he added.

NATO Secretary General Javier Solana has had authority since Jan. 30 to order airstrikes against the Serbs and is not required to consult alliance members again.

"As a practical matter," however, Solana probably would talk to the United States and possibly other allies before ordering bombardment, the U.S. spokesman said.

At the talks in France, Foreign Ministers Hubert Vedrine of France and Robin Cook of Britain said both sides showed signs of moving closer to a deal.

"It seems things are moving a bit," Vedrine said on the steps of the 14th-century chateau in Rambouillet, outside Paris, where talks have been taking place since Feb. 6. "But there is only a little time left."

Key to any Kosovo peace agreement is the deployment of a 30,000-strong NATO force in the province to ensure the deal is implemented. Belgrade's refusal so far to consider allowing such a force on Yugoslav territory has been a large roadblock in the talks.

Christopher Hill, the American who heads the international mediating team at the talks, flew to Belgrade on Tuesday with a tough message for Milosevic: Sign a deal by Saturday or face NATO missiles.

Milosevic, however, showed no sign of being intimidated.

"Our negative stand on the presence of foreign troops is not only the attitude of the leadership, but also of all the citizens of our country," Milosevic said in a statement carried by the official news agency Tanjug.

The six-nation Contact Group on the Balkans, made up of the United States, Russia, Britain, France, Germany and Italy, brought Serbs and secessionist Albanians to the negotiating table to end a conflict that has cost an estimated 2,000 lives and left hundreds of thousands homeless in the southern province of Serbia, the dominant of two Yugoslav republics.

Asked if Milosevic's "no" to foreign troops was definitive, Cook said: "Mr. Milosevic rarely confines himself to something as brief as saying no, and we are quite clear that there have been instructions given to the Serb delegation with respect to that." He did not elaborate.

A senior American official in Washington, D.C., speaking on condition of anonymity, said that if the Serbs agreed to the NATO force, an extension of the talks beyond the Saturday deadline might be considered to clear up some of the remaining unresolved issues.

In his statement, Milosevic reiterated the Serb stand that there can be no independence for Kosovo and that all ethnic communities in the province should have the same rights.

Ethnic Albanians make up 90 percent of Kosovo's 2 million people.

Washington has barred Yugoslavia from receiving badly needed loans from international financial institutions where it has decisive say, and Belgrade's assets are frozen in the United States. The European Union has imposed a flight ban on the Yugoslav national carrier.

become impossible to insulate the private investment market from politics, want some of the Social Security taxes workers pay to be diverted into such accounts and to allow individual workers to control their own investments.

"There's a lot of work and a lot of questions that have to be answered, but we feel very strongly that individual savings accounts are a very important feature," said Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fla., chairman of a House subcommittee on Social Security.

Clinton and the GOP agree in principle that 62 percent of the surplus should be used to shore up Social Security, but no agreement has evolved on how that should be done or what emphasis should be placed on cutting taxes.

"There is fundamentally a very simple choice," Clinton said. "Will our first priority be spending the budget surplus that we have worked so hard to create on a terrifically appealing tax cut in the moment?"

"Or will our first priority be investing whatever the necessary amount of the surplus is for at least the next 15 years to strengthen Social Security and Medicare?" he asked.

Dozens of students gathered Wednesday in the East Room of the White House to hear Clinton, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin and others address similar gatherings in 28 states via satellite.

Clinton criticized the GOP focus on tax cuts, saying that splurging with the budget surplus today instead of investing in the future would "tie the hands of future decision makers."

"For 200 years, the test of each generation of Americans has been not simply how well they did in their own time but whether they left our country in better shape for future generations," Clinton said. "Because of the size of the baby boom generation... we have a special responsibility to the generation represented by most of you in this room."

win. "It was a lack of aggression for us," Dies said. "We've got to come out and make the first move when we play KU. For K-State to beat them, we have to be the aggressor."

"We should have finished the comeback and beaten them. This was a game that we had a chance to win," Dies said.

In a game that featured a 31-percent shooting percentage by the Cats and 42-percent by the Hawks, K-State head coach Tom Asbury said his team didn't deserve to win.

"We really had three or four bad minutes of both halves," Asbury said. "We just didn't make the shot or the plays down the stretch to win the game. They shot it well in the first half, and we didn't shoot the ball well in the second. They ran their offense and made some good shots. We didn't deserve to win the game."

K-State was led by Dies, who scored 14 points, and May, who had 10.

COLORADO

came out attempting to play in control.

The Cats kept creeping closer to the lead and came within one point on a Kristin Rethman three-pointer. The shot was Rethman's first points of the game. A minute later, K-State would take the lead on a Harris lay-up, capping off a 9-3 run.

Down the stretch the two teams traded the lead five times, but Colorado would prevail behind the play of Linda Lappe, who led Colorado in scoring with 16 points.

Patterson said K-State's low shot percentage from the field is a reason the team needs to get back to basics.

"When you look at the turnovers and the three-point shooting and field-goal percentage, you realize we're not doing the little things," Patterson said. "The little things were a big factor in the loss tonight."

ATTENDANCE

"I think that, had the kids shown up, they would have enjoyed it and felt more empowered for their futures," McCrory said.

Because of the poor attendance, McCrory said she didn't know if any similar events were in the works for the future.

"I think we'll have to wait and see what the national take is," McCrory said. "I think it depends on how well it was received."

McCrory said she was surprised at how well the event was done, and that students missed out on an opportunity to address an issue relevant to their future.

"Kids don't think about social security," McCrory said. "But they need to be able to make an informed decision about it. It is their future."

remains unchanged from last season, although wide receivers coach Greg Peterson will now remove the "interim" from the recruiting coordinator title he picked up this off-season.

Peterson inherited the role upon Mangino's departure and will keep it based largely on a successful off-season in which the Wildcats signed 25 players to letters of intent.

Snyder finished out the appointments by naming Jeremy Martin and Darren Holmes as graduate assistant coaches.

Martin, an honorable-mention All-Big 12 selection last season as offensive guard, will assist Dunn in coaching the offensive line. Holmes will assist Gush in coaching the linebackers for four seasons as an undergraduate coach.

UNION

automatic bowling scores, and the student ID card program, Bernard Pitts, Union director, said.

"When Kyle initially looked at this concept, it had a price tag of a quarter of a million dollars," Pitts said.

Another way the cost of updating has been lowered is through simply waiting for computer technology to develop.

"We've been looking ahead and waiting for the right time," Hutson said. "Previously you've had to have more than one server, and have them all together and it would cost more in hardware and more in software."

"But I was able to look out and see that there would come a time when we would be able to get by with only one server. When that happened in November, that's when I started the ball rolling," Hutson said.

The request has been reviewed by only the Privilege Fee Committee.

So far, Union officials said, they have had a good response from Student Senate but feel the response will truly be determined at the Senate meeting tonight.

"I think there are a lot of people on the committee that supported and understood our needs," Pitts said.

"I think there were a few people there that passed it just so that it would have an opportunity to be heard on Student Senate. I think the feedback that we're really going to need to respond to is what we're going to hear on Thursday," he said.

Jeff Meder, Privilege Fee Committee chair, said the committee understands the Union's need for funding. The request is up for its first reading tonight and will be referred back to the committee for any last-minute changes on Sunday.

hours of credit."

The two programs are different but both are good educational experiences, Nafziger said. Exchanges mean K-State essentially is trading a certain number of students with another university and often are more individually based, while a group study trip is organized by K-State faculty for students.

Demand for both programs has increased during the last few years.

"Word-of-mouth plays a big part in student interest," Richter said. "Also, there has been a lot of support from faculty members and academic departments on campus. More of our faculty have been interested in international learning opportunities and are encouraging students to get involved."

Even though participation in study-abroad programs is increasing, both Richter and Nafziger said they agree they would like to see even more students involved.

"We're living in a global society now, and any field our students choose to enter will be affected by that environment. I'd like to see every student have the opportunity to gain new perspectives from international experiences," Nafziger said.

Students interested in any kind of international program should start planning as early as possible, Richter said. Deadlines for most of the exchange programs for the fall 1999 semester are due in February, including applications for this summer's group study programs, Nafziger said.

Information is available in the Office of International Programs in Fairchild 304. There are also advisers in the office to help students make travel and course work plans.

"As a major university, K-State should provide meaningful opportunities for all of its students," Richter said. "We've seen an increase in numbers, but we're still not where we want to be."

Probation extended

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The NCAA announced Thursday that the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' probation will be extended for one year as a result of recruitment violations involving running back Frank Murphy.

The probation does not result in a loss of scholarships or other on-field penalties, but it does require the athletic department to supply regular reports that verify its efforts to reach compliance with the probation's terms.

Because this most recent violation fell within a five-year period of rules violations in 1994 and 1997, the university was subject to the NCAA's repeat-violator bylaws, but the NCAA elected not to impose those penalties.

Bonnie Slatton, the acting chairwoman of the NCAA's Division I Committee on Infractions, said K-State's response should be a model for other institutions.

"In what is a model of institutional responsibility, its staff immediately notified the NCAA and then launched an intensive investigation," Slatton said.

"As soon as they had knowledge, they reacted quickly and decisively, and we saw no need for additional penalties," she said.

Athletic Director Max Urlick said he was pleased by the decision. He said it affirmed the department's self-corrective measures.

"I have to be pleased that the committee viewed our handling of this case as exemplary and suggested that the manner in which we responded serves as a model for other institutions," Urlick said.

"I see the committee's announcement as an endorsement of our compliance-monitoring program and the finding of no fault on the part of our institution a credit to Coach (Bill) Snyder and his staff."

Urlick also said he was grateful that he and his staff now would have a chance to return to business as usual.

"One thing I don't think people realize is the time consumed in all of this," Urlick said. "It has been a distraction to our staff and a distraction to the coaching staff as well. The time consumed by department members in this matter is hard to calculate."

Although Snyder said the process had bothered him and his staff, he also said that Murphy finally would be able to move past the incident.

"Frank Murphy has suffered from this episode and has acknowledged his responsibility for not exercising appropriate judgment," Snyder said. "He can now put the ordeal behind him."

Committee cuts salary increase

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The House Education Budget Committee rejected Gov. Bill Graves' proposal to increase faculty salaries Monday, recommending instead that the majority of the money in Graves' proposal be used to fund other educational projects.

Graves originally recommended giving faculty the same 3.5-percent salary increase that other state employees outside the civil service system would receive. But he also proposed an extra $2.5 million to enhance faculty salaries in his January budget proposal.

However, the House Education Budget Committee only recommended $1 million of the proposed $2.5 million to be used for the salary increase. The committee proposed that the other $1.5 million be used to fund other campus projects. Among these is a University of Kansas day-care center, a student center at Pittsburg State and a Geological Survey Institute program at Fort Hays State University.

Susan Peterson, K-State assistant to the president for governmental relations, said K-State is not receiving any money for enhancement projects.

"We're disappointed that the recommendation is enhancing other projects at the expense of faculty salaries," Peterson said.

Barb Conant, director of communications at the Kansas Board of Regents, said the regents originally proposed a 7.6-percent increase for faculty salaries because they felt Graves' 4.7-percent increase was too small. This would require a total of $17 million to be used for increasing faculty salaries, compared to Graves' proposal of $2.5 million.

Conant said faculty salaries are the regents' highest priority.

"It hasn't reached crisis proportions yet, but we have a problem brewing here," Conant said. "We're losing good faculty to other institutions who offer raises of $15,000 or more and other benefits. ... It's the students who will feel the impact of this."

One of the reasons for this proposed salary increase by regents was faculty leaving for higher-paying jobs at other institutions. But Kathie Lloyd, House

Sounding Off

A row of tanks are parked at Fort Riley on Thursday afternoon awaiting maintenance so they can be used during maneuvers at a firing range. The sound of the guns going off at the range can be heard in parts of Manhattan.

Lt. Chris Howsden uses a scope to help navigate a tank down a trail Thursday afternoon. Howsden was giving instructions to the driver, who sits near the front of the tank.

Noise from Fort Riley reminds community of military presence

The big, booming sounds sometimes heard from the west might seem like a nuisance, but they serve an important purpose to our national security.

The sounds come from Fort Riley's shooting ranges. Soldiers fire various weapons during training procedures to get ready for their month-long turn at the National Training Center in California. The training, both at Fort Riley and NTC, helps the soldiers become more proficient in using weapons in case of military action at home or abroad.

"That's the sound of freedom," said Scott Price, Fort Riley communications relations officer.

Spring enrollment up by nearly 200

High school enrollment tied to K-State growth.

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's spring enrollment increased by nearly 200 students from last spring, continuing a recent, modest growth trend.

Twentieth-day enrollment figures show K-State has 19,004 students enrolled this semester, up from 18,809 in spring 1998.

This pattern of growth has been consistent for the past several years, said Ron Downey, director of planning and analysis.

"Our enrollment rises and falls as the enrollment at the high schools rises and falls," Downey said. "We've had an increase in the number of incoming freshmen for the past three to four years."

Downey said because enrollment for high schools shows no signs of letting up, he expects to see enrollment continue to inch upward for at least a few more years.

"We don't see an explosion, but the number of students in the high schools is continuing to increase," Downey said. "We'll get our fair share of those each year, and that will accumulate over time."

While the spring enrollment figures are up from last year, second-semester enrollment actually dropped off from enrollment in the first semester of 1998. Registrar Don Foster said such a decrease is typical.

"Spring enrollment generally reflects what happened in the fall," Foster said.

Downey said the reasons for this drop-off partially relate to problems with grades students can have over the course of a semester.

"That's a normal process," Downey said. "We do, in fact, have a policy that drops people below a GPA of one."

Besides students who are dismissed, Downey said a number of students transfer for personal reasons and many graduated in December.

None of the fluctuations in enrollment were a surprise, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said. Although not surprised, Bosco said he was happy to see the numbers continue to grow.

"It's a very nice increase," Bosco said. "We're very pleased."

The recent increase in enrollment followed a half-decade decline, during which time Downey said the number of incoming freshmen just wasn't enough to sustain the enrollment numbers.

"We've been through a decrease in high school students," Downey said. "Now it seems to be going back up."

Overall enrollment at schools in the Kansas Board of Regents increased by 409 students. Fort Hays State University showed the biggest increase with 198 more students than last spring. Emporia State University, meanwhile, lost 77 students.

ENROLLMENT UPDATE

The Kansas Board of Regents reported Thursday that enrollment remained steady at Kansas's six public universities and their branches. Overall enrollment increased by 409 students, or 0.5 percent. Enrollment ranged from a loss of 77 students at Emporia State University to an increase of 198 students at Fort Hays State University.

Donation will provide freshman scholarships

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A $2.4 million bequest to the KSU Foundation marks the largest single-gift donation ever granted to K-State to fund scholarships.

The bequest, which will be announced formally at a press conference Monday, came from the estate of Florence Harold Marcoux, who graduated from K-State with a master's degree in dietetics and institutional advancement in 1936.

The money will be used to fund scholarships for incoming freshmen, said Trish Oakley, communication coordinator for the Foundation.

Oakley said the new scholarship will rival the Putnam Scholarship, although it will be for freshmen only. She also said it will focus less on academic achievement and more on other pursuits than the Putnam does.

"This scholarship will be awarded based on leadership activities and community service, as well as academic performance," Oakley said.

Oakley said Marcoux has been giving money to K-State since 1983, when she created trusts to benefit the William and Melissa Harold Scholarship in honor of her parents.

When the estate was distributed, Washburn University in Topeka received $1.9 million to perpetuate the memory of Marcoux's husband, Dale, who had been a professor there for more than 30 years.

Hurst Coffman, an attorney with Coffman, DeFries and Nothern in Topeka, the firm that represents Marcoux's estate, said Marcoux made her fortune through her strict lifestyle.

"She and her husband were both school teachers," Coffman said. "She lived a thrifty life and was a shrewd investor."

"She rode the bus, wore plain clothing. She was not known as a socialite."

Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the KSU Foundation, said this large bequest hopefully would prompt other donors to increase the amount they give to the Foundation.

"This sets a precedent," Hellebust said. "I think it will encourage other people to Naked man eludes police on chase before falling

A Fort Riley man was arrested Thursday morning on several charges, including indecent liberties with a child, but not before leading police on a chase that landed him the hospital.

The Riley County Police Department received a complaint early Thursday morning concerning a suspicious man in his 20s. The police report described the man as having a "military style haircut, pot belly, wearing no clothing."

Manuel Vasquez, Fort Riley, ran out of an apartment, completely naked, following suspicious activities inside the domicile at Oxford Place.

Officer Mark French followed after Vasquez in a foot chase near the apartment complex.

When Vasquez reached a drainage ditch east of the apartment complex, he fell nine feet over the edge onto concrete.

Police escorted Vasquez to the hospital to receive a CAT scan and check for injuries before arresting him.

Later that morning, Vasquez was arrested by the RCPD for aggravated indecent liberties with a child, aggravated burglary and legal obstruction, Lieutenant Jay Mills said.

Bond was set at $10,000.

Free display in Willard Hall features student sculptures

Sculptures by K-State students are now on display in the Willard Art Gallery.

The gallery, located on the first floor of Willard Hall, opened the exhibit of the students' work on Monday. The exhibit closes on Feb. 26, Daniel Hunt, assistant professor of art, said. He said he has seen firsthand the work and dedication the students have put into their pieces.

"They've spent a lot of time and energy to put this together," he said. "It's a big commitment of their time."

Hunt also said he thought the hard work of the students was apparent in the sculptures that are included in the exhibition.

"It's an impressive show, and there's a great execution of ideas," he said.

There will be an artist's reception for the students from 6 to 8 p.m. Saturday in the gallery. The event is free of charge and open to the public.

For more information about the reception or the exhibit, call the gallery at 532-6605.

Missouri ceremony to honor three new NATO members

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has invited the foreign ministers of Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary to a ceremony in Independence, Mo., on March 12 to mark the accession of the three countries into the NATO alliance.

The ceremony will take place at the Truman Presidential Library.

The venue was chosen to honor the announcement by President Truman of the creation of NATO 50 years ago, the State Department said.

Abortion clinics closed after more anthrax threats

MILWAUKEE — At least four abortion clinics and a Planned Parenthood center closed Thursday after receiving packages with warnings they contained anthrax.

The FBI planned to analyze the materials sent to a Planned Parenthood center in Manchester, N.H., and abortion clinics in Washington, D.C.; Milwaukee; Cincinnati; and Rapid City, S.D. As with other recent anthrax threats, there was no indication the deadly bacterium actually was used.

Planned Parenthood centers in Sioux Falls, S.D., and Burlington, Vt., also reported receiving suspicious packages. It was not immediately known whether the packages contained any threat of anthrax.

In Milwaukee, the person who opened the envelope and three firefighters who were the first on the scene had to go to a hospital for decontamination and observation.

Anthrax threats have been common in recent months. Last fall, abortion clinics in four states were the subjects of fake threats.

Barbara Walters' interview with Lewinsky approved

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Monica Lewinsky's lawyers and prosecutors in Kenneth Starr's office have agreed to restrictions that will allow the former White House intern to be interviewed by ABC's Barbara Walters, two legal sources said Thursday.

Under the arrangement, reached after several days of discussions, Starr is permitting Lewinsky to talk about a wide range of topics pertaining to the investigation of President Clinton.

The main limitation is that she cannot make statements that go beyond what she has already told the grand jury and Starr's office in numerous interviews, the sources said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Cuba targets political opponents, violent crime

HAVANA — Besieged by violence on the streets and ideological attacks on the airwaves, Cuba's communist government has moved to reassert control over the island by setting tough new laws and sentences for both common and political criminals.

Cuban lawmakers on Tuesday approved setting prison terms of up to 20 years for people convicted of promoting U.S. policy aimed at forcing a change in Fidel Castro's government.

First proposed three years ago in response to the tightening of the U.S. trade embargo against Cuba, the "Law for the Protection of Cuba's National Independence and Economy" was approved unanimously by the Cuban parliament late Tuesday.

The law also set fines for those accused of crimes that affect "the fundamental interests, political or economic" of Cuba.

Ricardo Alarcon, president of the parliament, said the move "reaffirms our spirit of resistance and our continued fight to preserve our revolution."

The crackdown on pro-U.S. dissidence also comes amid a general toughening throughout Cuba's government. Tuesday, lawmakers revised the penal code to include the death penalty for government officials who engage in drug trafficking and increased sentences for smugglers of illegal aliens.

Kurdish and Greek supporters of captured Kurdistan Workers Party rebel leader Abdullah Ocalan throw stones, boxes and chairs toward Greek riot police during a protest march to the Turkish embassy in Athens on Thursday. Some 10,000 people took part in the march to the office of Greek Prime Minister Costas Simitis and to the Turkish embassy to protest against Ocalan's capture.

Turkey quells Kurd protests

By SUZAN FRASER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey moved to stifle Kurdish protests at home and crush Kurdish rebels in northern Iraq on Thursday, while prosecutors interrogated the rebel leader Abdullah Ocalan at a tightly secured island prison.

The capture of Ocalan continued to fuel Kurdish protests in Europe for the third day, particularly in Germany, where it was feared the Kurdish conflict would spill over onto its soil.

Turkey saw its most violent protests yet when pro-Kurdish demonstrators and police clashed in the southern city of Ceyhan, injuring three policemen and one demonstrator, the Anatolia news agency said.

The Turkish military released a video Thursday showing Ocalan being led from a ship, his head covered by a hood, onto the island of Imrali, in the Sea of Marmara, where he was made to pose in front of a line of Turkish flags. Turkish stations ran the footage with a caption reading, "This is the image Turkey has been waiting for the past 15 years."

Police, meanwhile, led sweeps that, according to the independent Human Rights Association, have netted as many as 750 Kurdish activists since Tuesday in Istanbul and the southeast, the heartland of Ocalan's guerrilla war since 1984.

With Ocalan's rebel Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, apparently leaderless, the military kept up its latest incursion into neighboring northern Iraq in pursuit of the rebels, who have bases there.

Turkish troops, numbering 10,000 according to newspapers and backed by helicopters and warplanes, chased Ocalan's fighters in northern Iraq for a fourth day. They drove as far as six miles into the country, an Iraqi Kurdish group said.

Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit said the government would renew a call to rebels to surrender, assuring them the Parliament would pass a law providing lenient punishment after elections in April.

Fallout was heavy from the Turkish commando operation that snatched Ocalan from Greek diplomatic hands in Nairobi, Kenya, on Monday.

Three Cabinet ministers, including the foreign minister, were forced to resign in Athens, and in Nairobi, the Cabinet was reshuffled.

Even tiny Luxembourg felt reverberations. It announced it was tightening its borders to prevent angry Kurds, who have stormed Greek and other embassies in more than 20 large European cities to protest the capture, from spilling in.

Ocalan was brought to Turkey on Tuesday after Turkish special forces snatched him away from Nairobi, where he was staying in the Greek ambassador's residence.

Three state security court prosecutors interrogated Ocalan on the four-square-mile island, where he is detained alone following the hasty transfer of all other inmates at the prison.

Ecevit said a trial would begin soon. Ocalan faces terrorism charges

Senate chair encourages students to run for office.

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Students who want to run for a Student Governing Association office have until 4 p.m. today to file in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Student Senate Chair Gabe Eckert said he encourages everyone to run, even if they don't know a lot about SGA.

"If someone has an interest, they should definitely file and seek that position," he said. "Everyone goes through the process of learning about SGA."

If students didn't have any government involvement in high school, they still should think about running if they are concerned about issues at K-State, Eckert said.

"I think some of our best senators and council members have come in with no previous knowledge," he said. "They can sometimes be our best assets."

Eckert said students can call current senators at the OSAS if they want to know more about what the responsibilities would be.

Although Eckert said he didn't know the numbers yet, he said he was confident the turnout would be better than last year.

"I'm real optimistic that we'll have a larger number of students running for positions in Senate this year," he said.

Eckert said he was confident because Senate was more efficient this year than in other years.

"Senate's efficiency and tackling of issues that are meaningful to students will hopefully draw more students to run for SGA positions," he said. "And, hopefully, that will lead to better voter turnout."

Gayle Spencer, OSAS coordinator, said she had looked through the filing applications and thought the number was higher than last year.

"I can already tell they're up," she said.

Spencer said she also agreed with Eckert that shorter and more efficient Senate meetings had contributed to an increased number of people running.

"I think we're doing a better job of advertising, as well," she said.

Eckert said he wanted to remind students who are thinking about running that it is a three-step process. First, they have to make the filing deadline; they have to attend one of the mandatory meetings on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday from 7 to 8 p.m.; and they need to turn in an expenditure report to the OSAS by March 5 at 4 p.m.

Eckert said SGA had been focusing on getting people to run but will change its focus after today.

"On Monday, we're going to start focusing on getting as many students to vote," he said.

"SENATE'S EFFICIENCY AND TACKLING OF ISSUES THAT ARE MEANINGFUL TO STUDENTS WILL HOPEFULLY DRAW MORE STUDENTS TO RUN FOR SGA POSITIONS."

Better late than never? Flu season is here

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The flu has struck Kansas late this year, leaving many students sick.

Last year's flu season hit during the second and third weeks of January. This year, it didn't arrive until the third and fourth weeks.

"February has been a busy month," said Cathie Barry, director of nursing at Lafene Health Center. "We've seen a lot of ill people this past week."

Lafene has diagnosed 141 patients with the flu since Dec. 10, compared with 133 people during the same period last year.

The most common symptoms associated with flu are a high fever, chills, head and body aches, fatigue, sore throat and coughing.

"It can come on real slowly or hit someone like a brick," Barry said.

The flu is transmitted by respiratory droplets from other people.

The flu usually can stay in a person's system for up to seven days. It can take an additional week or two for the symptoms to disappear completely.

"We've seen a lot of flu-related illnesses in the emergency room," said Julie Lea, director of community relations at Mercy Health Center. "But it's not an unusually high number and not a big outbreak."

Type A flu, the most common kind this year, accounts for nearly two-thirds of all cases. Medication is only helpful in treating Type A.

People who take the flu immunization should do so in October or November because it can take four weeks for a person's system to develop an immunity. The vaccine is more than 70-percent effective.

"Once the flu has been established in the community, the vaccine doesn't do a lot of good," Barry said.

Lafene has used all of its supply of flu vaccine. The flu is easier to catch for students who live in close quarters, such as the residence halls, sororities or fraternities.

The flu season normally goes through March, but outbreaks are more common earlier in the winter.

"The flu occurs more in the winter months, because more and more people are inside and in closed rooms because it's cold outside," Barry said. "This allows for the flu to spread more."

Criteria could affect student body make-up

Kansas is the only state without qualified admissions for higher education.

That will change, of course, in 2001, when all universities under the Kansas Board of Regents will require students to meet criteria for admission.

Without strong effort from high schools, however, the requirements might affect the make-up of K-State's student body negatively.

The intent of qualified admissions is to raise the standard, and therefore the quality, of students in Kansas higher education.

The fear, however, is that the requirements will give students from wealthier and larger school districts a distinct advantage and would create a less diverse student body.

To prevent this, much of the burden falls on the shoulders of high school counselors. Students must be reminded early and often about the requirements they will need gain admission to a university. When the universities start recruiting students during their junior year in high school, it might be too late to remind them to take certain classes.

University recruiting will play a part for the students who do not meet the requirements. Up to 10 percent of a university's freshman class can fall below the requirements. It is important that K-State look carefully at who is being considered for this 10 percent. A campus community must reflect the community from which it pulls students. There should be an effort to look at which groups will be underrepresented and make sure to offer a fair balance of students.

High school students should be realistic, as well. The majority of students who fail to meet the requirements would not fare well at the university setting. It might be more beneficial to those students to spend a couple of years at a community college before tackling university classes that assume a certain level of knowledge.

However, the 10-percent leeway hopefully will offer a second chance to those few sharp students who just couldn't find their niche in high school.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

Feb. 16, 1999 — name that day. Nope, not just another Tuesday. No, not two days after Valentine's Day. No, not 31 days before spring break.

Feb. 16 was State Education Day. Representatives from K-State, the University of Kansas, Pittsburg State University, Fort Hays State University, Wichita State University and Emporia State University gathered in Topeka to lobby legislators about concerns for our campuses. This year, three areas were addressed: faculty salaries, financial aid and library funding.

There is going to be a theme in this column: Representatives from the Kansas Board of Regents schools cannot sway the Legislature alone. They need everyone's help. Your help. So write to your delegates, and other delegates if you want, and let them know how you feel about these issues. You can vote, so they'll listen.

During the past 20 years, tuition for regents schools has increased 9 percent annually, and state funding increased at only 5 percent. This unreciprocated increase is creating a situation in which tuition revenue is paying 9.8 percent more for higher education than the gentleman's agreement of 25 percent.

The increasing tuition creates a large financial strain on students who rely on financial aid to finance their education. If this situation is not remedied soon, higher education will become an elitist institution, as it once was.

The regents are asking for a $2 million increase: $1 million in financial aid; and $1 million in need-based scholarships. This affects you. If you receive financial aid, you're probably not receiving as much as students in other comparable state institutions. Only 10.3 percent of Kansas undergraduates receive need-based financial aid — less than half the national average. Even if you're not receiving financial aid, maybe you should be.

Write your legislators to let them know you support the increase in financial aid for regents schools.

However, a higher education hardly matters if the faculty delivering this education isn't qualified. Salaries attract competent, knowledgeable teachers. Unfortunately, K-State and the rest of the regents schools fall in the bottom half of their peer institutions in the faculty-salary category. Not only are we losing valuable faculty members to other institutions, we also don't have competitive wages to attract qualified replacements.

The regents are asking for a 7.6-percent faculty salary increase. This increase won't solve all of our problems, but it will lead us in the right direction.

Write your legislators to let them know you support the increase in faculty salaries.

The third issue discussed was library funding, or rather, a lack thereof. This dilemma is, or should be, close to the hearts of all students, faculty and staff here at K-State. There is debate over how the library is going to be funded. Possible solutions include increasing the privilege fee. This idea was shot down, because privilege fees are supposed to make improvements upon the university that already is providing baseline standards. The Privilege Fee Committee appropriately thought a library with research materials was part of that basic service and thus should not be funded with a privilege fee.

The other ideas include increasing tuition, which won't happen unless KU and Wichita State also increase theirs, or the creation of a separate library fee or an endowment out of the leftover reserves of the Privilege Fee Committee accounts.

We as students should not have to pay directly to sustain a crumbling resource center. That's the state's job. After all, this is a state-funded institution. Maybe it should start funding it adequately.

The regents' request of a 3.4-percent Other Operating Expenses increase, in addition to a 1-percent dedicated library funding increase, would allow all of the regents schools not only to maintain the current level but also to improve.

Write your representative and senator to let them know you support the increase in library funding.

As Brad Montgomery, Student Senate governmental-relations director, said, the legislators were receptive to student representatives during State Education Day. As was said before, a handful of students cannot pull the weight of six universities. They need your help.

So write to your representative and senator, and get your roommates to write to theirs. If we all show that we care, then we will have a much better chance of making our universities more competitive.

DAVID LEVIN

Bringing joy to others overshadows life's disappointments

No one might ever learn the meaning of life, but I've learned how to give life meaning.

Last week, Becky Guthrie wrote in her column that life at times might be painful but that we can choose whether to be miserable. Well, that's easier said than done. Personally, right now I'm going through the lowest point so far in my life. I've recently gone through a divorce from my wife to whom I was married for nearly a decade and the subsequent breakup with a woman I had known for a while and had started dating as my marriage was coming to end.

My ex-wife and I never had the best marriage, but I guess it wasn't the worst, either. Our period of dating was a series of breakups and reconcilings. We got married because we sort of had to; I wanted my soon-to-be son to have a present father. Like all coupled relationships, mistakes were made. Ours were made on a not-so-strong foundation. It wasn't all bad. I really did enjoy being the father in a family with a son and a daughter.

After the divorce, the bitterness and resentment I first had toward my wife soon turned to despair and profound loneliness. Upon self-examination, I have come to understand how much of the marriage's slow unraveling over the years was my own fault. I held onto resentment instead of using that energy toward building the strong foundation that we never had. My ex-wife is a good person, a smart person and a reasonable person. We both have our share of personal issues we needed to work out, but after the divorce I started to believe that these issues would not have been strong enough to outweigh resolving our joint issues had I not been such a complete idiot.

This of course has added to my guilt for making my wife live through this and self-loathing for not honestly trying to resolve our deep-seated problems (the self-loathing ended Tuesday night when, after a long talk with my ex-wife, I realized that we truly don't complement each other in the way to make for a fulfilling relationship). Add to the mix a healthy dose of graduate-student anxiety and a second breakup, and I've become an emotional cripple.

Rationally, I understand there is nothing special about me and these feelings are natural and a lot of people go through this. I have thus, as Guthrie suggested, tried to put these feelings aside. I have told myself that I now have experienced these emotions, and now it is time to put them away and get on with my life. Yet, at times when I most need to concentrate on my work, my mind drags me back into my misery, and my work comes to a halt. When I'm alone in the house my ex-wife and I used to live in, and I see the remnants of my family all about, there's nothing to do but to dwell on my situation.

Because trying to fight these emotions didn't work, I tried immersing myself completely in the emotions. I figured it takes a lot of energy to feel bad, and if I let myself wallow in it, maybe I'll get tired of being miserable and I'll be my old happy self again. It turns out that my stamina for maintaining grief seems to be greater than I imagined.

In the meantime, I don't want to burden others with my personal life. Because no one enjoys being around a sourpuss, I've tried to project an outward appearance of being extremely well. Maybe some of this excessive goodwill will reflect from others back to me. If someone asks how I'm doing, I'll tell them I'm doing great or fantastic, while inside the tightness moves between my cardiac and anterior abdominal cavities.

The other day I started to think about when I feel most normal, when I'm not consumed by negative emotions, when I don't feel the tightness in my chest and gut. There are times during my weekly routines when I feel OK.

One of these times is when I'm teaching. Monday, I was particularly low. It took all I had not to completely lose it.

But as soon as class started and I began my lab on insects, my despair slipped away and I felt good for a while.

I also feel good when I'm being a father to my children. My misery does not exist when I'm caring for the children, playing with them, loving them.

The third time is when I write these columns. Even this one, where I'm dwelling on my emotions.

Then I realize what the common denominator is among these three disparate events. In each of these situations, I'm giving to others. When I'm teaching, I'm giving my knowledge and expertise in entomology. When I'm with my children, I'm giving my love. And when I'm writing these columns, well, maybe all I'm giving is bird-cage lining.

My resulting contentment is from knowing my efforts are appreciated. Enough of my old students have come back to tell me how much they have enjoyed my class. My children frequently and spontaneously give me hugs and a kisses and tell me how much they love me.

Readers often tell me how I made this or that good point or informed them on something they didn't know or made them laugh.

I was talking to a friend after winter break and asked her what she did over Christmas. "Not much," she answered. "I gave my grandmother a bath." Of all the things she did during vacation, giving her ailing grandmother a bath was what she tells me about. This gesture of giving was important to her and apparently more meaningful to her than what Santa left under the tree.

My father's parents lived close to where my parents lived. During the last few years of my grandmother's life, my father spent a great deal of time taking care of her: shopping for food, taking her to the doctor and figuring out her finances. I asked my father about this period of his life. He told me it was his duty and responsibility as a son to take care of his mother, but he also said that although it was stressful, taking care of his mother made him feel more complete as a human being.

I'm not telling anyone they have to go out and do anything as grand as helping out a dying person, joining Habitat for Humanity or holding a crack baby. I'm not telling anyone to do anything. I just want to point out that giving, even in the smallest of ways, is the most important thing one can do as a human. Do you not feel better when you give someone a present that's truly appreciated than when you receive a truly appreciated present? It is through giving that makes us feel that we are of consequence, that we matter and that our lives have meaning.

Station's decision to change show's time slot wasn't discriminatory

Editor,

I am writing in response to the ongoing controversy concerning KSDB-FM 91.9. I am sickened by the fact that few people are aware of the bigger picture. There have been many comments concerning the "Jam the Box" controversy; however, I now believe that it has gone too far. The discrimination accusations of have now compromised the future of KSDB.

I have lived in Manhattan my entire life, and I honestly can say I have never listened to KSDB until this year. The new format was an ingenious idea, finally putting K-State's radio station among the genre of highly respected and popular stations. At last, KSDB was something to be proud of. There was just one glitch — it decided to try something new and switch a time slot around. The show was not completely discarded, like all of the other previous shows; it just was moved back a few hours.

I can understand why Black Student Union would be upset. It was a show that was quite popular, and I believe its members did the right thing in pointing out their feelings to the management of KSDB. However, I do believe that the accusation of discrimination was a hasty one.

As a journalism student, I can attest to the fact that radio stations develop their formats based on a "recycling" theory in which you try to keep your listeners as long as you can. You do not do this by suddenly switching from one kind of music to another or by playing music that people do not care to listen to at a certain time of the day. After all, that's where the old KSDB went wrong. I believe the (program director) when he says that demographics showed that an urban music show would be more popular later at night. Every station bases their format on the demographics, not their personal likes and dislikes.

The bottom line is this. The station might have made a mistake. It tried something new, which a portion of the audience did not like, so it was changed back. But the accusations have not stopped. Funding for the station has been delayed pending an investigation into the so-called racist actions of the station, which appalls me. I do not believe that the station has acted in any way discriminatory toward the African-American students on campus. If the station is shut down, no one will win, but everyone will lose. If KSDB really was discriminatory, "Jam the Box" would not even be aired.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

Danetri Thompson's column in the Tuesday Collegian was wonderful. Right on the mark. Well put. More people need to read it. Good job, Miss Thompson.

Considering community service, philanthropies, campus involvement and superior grades, the greek system seems to be more beneficial than it does harm to K-State.

How many years of NIT is it going to take before we realize that Asbury isn't even good enough to coach a fourth-grade team?

How can someone possibly argue that the greek system gives the, quote, real students here at K-State a bad name? The greek system here is very strong, and its members are held to a higher set of rules and regulations than other students.

In response to the caller who, on Tuesday, insinuated that greek members aren't real students, I'd like to tell them that to become a real adult they should learn to not stereotype.

I'm calling in regards to whoever claims that we should abolish the greek system here at K-State. Are you saying we aren't real students because we're in an organization? In that case we should abolish all clubs and student organizations. That way we can all be real students, according to your definition.

In response to the Campus Fourum the other day, I just wanted to say that I really do like Vanilla Ice, and I'm tired of people confusing him with Ice Cube, and calling him "Ice Ice" and things like that.

I'd like to ask the men of Alpha Tau Omega — Didn't your mothers ever teach you, "If you can't say anything nice, don't say anything at all?" There are other women at KSU other than sorority girls. Next time, guys, try being gentlemen.

I'm sick of playing musical parking spaces.

Given all the hullabaloo about DB92 moving the urban music program back, I thought it was interesting to note that the urban music group "Imani," which performed in the Union tonight, had an attendance of about 35 people, which was made up largely of the UPC people who brought them here.

Last fall, Senator Brownback made repeated calls in the media for President Clinton's resignation. Who does he think he's fooling by calling himself an impartial juror in the trial to impeach the president?

I think that the Ticketmaster in the Kansas State Union is great and that the students should be informed about the Ticketmaster so they won't have to drive to Topeka or Kansas City to buy tickets anymore.

This is for Patricia Elliott, the junior who couldn't find a parking space. Use the shuttle. Try from the Foundation to the Student Union.

Three months until finals. I can't wait to get out of this pitiful town.

For all you morons who can't get it right, it's the Wildcat 91.9, not DB92.

Pileup injures 3, backs up afternoon traffic

By GINNY THOMAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Traffic was backed up on Fort Riley Boulevard at about 2 p.m. Thursday after rain and an abrupt stop created an accident involving more than six cars.

The vehicles came to a halt when one car stopped suddenly on Fort Riley Boulevard to make a turn.

The turning car fled the scene, leaving five cars that had been caught in a chain-reaction accident.

Three people at the front of the wreck were injured. Two of the three injured were transported to Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

The weather on Thursday was typical of the dynamic weather that Kansas has been experiencing lately. After days of sunshine and warmth, some drivers did not change their driving styles due to the rain.

"When it rains, people think they can drive like normal," Patrol Officer Clint Breithaupt said on the scene. "When the weather is bad, drivers need to be careful and slow down."

Breithaupt said drivers are encouraged to drive with caution when the roads might be slick or wet.

Kosovo's Serbs, Albanians prepare for worst as peace deadline nears

■ Failure to reach peace might result in airstrikes.

By ELLEN KNICKMEYER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GODISHNJAK, Yugoslavia — Civilians stocked up on food and international monitors began packing Thursday in Kosovo, hoping peace will come by a weekend deadline but fearing NATO airstrikes and retaliatory attacks if it doesn't.

In the north, ethnic Albanian guerrillas kept government forces in their rifle sights, anticipating bloodshed across the province, including the capital, Pristina.

Serb military convoys moved across the south of the province, and monitors for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe suspected the activity might be a show of force ahead of Saturday's noon deadline for an accord at peace talks in France.

Thus far, the Serbs have remained firm in rejecting foreign peacekeeping troops, which could waylay an accord. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who said Thursday in Washington, D.C., that she warned Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic he would be "hit hard" if NATO attacks, planned to fly to Paris on Friday to rejoin negotiations.

Mediators are seeking an end to a year of fighting that has killed an estimated 2,000 people. Hundreds of thousands also have been driven from their homes in a year of fighting between Serbs and independence-seeking ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, the poor southern province of Serbia, a Yugoslav republic.

Western embassies in the Yugoslav capital Belgrade, meanwhile, prepared to evacuate nonessential staff and dependents. Canadian officials said their evacuation would begin Friday, and U.S. Embassy sources said they might begin evacuating people the same day.

With the threat of NATO airstrikes, some Pristina residents started storing supplies as a precaution.

"There has to be some agreement," said Esat Dauti, talking with a friend on an icy street. "There's no other way."

Dauti expressed fears that the province's rural villagers would be isolated, hungry and vulnerable in any conflict.

On Thursday, tanks, armored personnel carriers and artillery rolled along the main roads in lines up to 30 vehicles long. In Montenegro, the other republic in Serbian-dominated Yugoslavia, the government was reported to be calling up reservists. Similar calls in Kosovo were rumored but unconfirmed.

In neighboring Macedonia, NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana was overseeing plans for either deployment of peace troops or an evacuation force to remove 1,300 international ceasefire monitors from Kosovo.

Monitors of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe went about their patrols Thursday in Kosovo but said their bags were packed back at their hotels. The group's chairman, Knut Vollebaek, announced in Washington that evacuation plans were in the works.

Solana refused to say when NATO airstrikes might begin if the deadline passed with no deal but said it would be soon.

In Washington, the Clinton administration ordered 51 U.S. warplanes to join an already powerful attack force in Europe. Defense Secretary William Cohen told reporters that the planes would be ready for a possible attack by the middle of next week.

Among Kosovo's outnumbered Serbs, resistance only hardened with each passing hour.

"The Americans ask too much," said a 25-year-old Serb in Kosovo Polje, a Serb-dominated town outside Pristina, who only gave his first name, Dragan.

At the northern village of Godishnjak, 20 miles north of Pristina, one rebel commander who gave his name only as Ali peered through holes in a brick wall that had been blasted by tanks. Residents of the cities, he said, should be worried.

Unlike in rural settlements, ethnic Albanians and Serbs live segregated in the cities, each side heavily armed. In the cities, Ali said, ethnic Albanians would be captive targets for the anger of Serb forces.

K-State plays host to Big 12 indoor track meet

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents have the opportunity to watch some of the country's top athletes today and Saturday at Ahearn Field House when K-State is host of the Big 12 Conference Indoor Track and Field Championship beginning at 8 a.m.

The Cats are looking to win using a simple concept: earn as many points as possible. Doing so requires depth, which multi-event athlete Carmen Wright said the women's team might have, although Texas and Nebraska are favored to win.

"For a team that's as small as we are, to score in almost all events is a really big accomplishment," Wright said. "If Texas takes first in an event and we take second and third, then we just outscored them, so depth is a very important thing."

Coach Cliff Rovelto said the Big 12 is a tough conference on the men's side in that the first-place team might score only a few more points than the fifth-place team.

"Anybody that scores significantly in this conference is pretty good, but between two teams the difference may just be one or two good athletes," Rovelto said. "It's much closer and a much more balanced conference than we've ever seen before."

Many athletes said they hope the weekend's culminating event will give them the chance either to earn a personal record or, preferably, earn a provisional or automatic qualifying mark for the NCAA Indoor Championship.

"There's a lot of people on this team going to the national meet, and I think that speaks well for our program," distance runner Zach Davies said. "I think after this weekend we'll have some more people hit provisional and automatic qualifying marks."

Also at stake for the women's team is a national ranking; the team has been ranked No. 1 for the majority of the season but dropped to No. 4 this week.

"The women were ranked pretty highly because we're a well-rounded team," Wright said. "To put a team together like that that can be ranked this highly is a big accomplishment for us."

Davies said what sets the conference meet apart from duals and triangulars is the number of people. Additionally, preliminaries are required for most of the events this week, which some athletes said can be challenging.

"Some of the challenge is just getting out of the preliminaries — if you don't run with intensity then you may have to sit and watch the finals knowing you could have run it at that time," sprinter Karriema Parris said.

The team has focused on the Big 12 meet all year with the intent of beating conference rivals and earning NCAA qualifying marks. The indoor season also provides an opportunity to prepare for the outdoor season.

"For indoor, we have our championships this weekend and some of us might qualify for nationals," Parris said. "If not, then we'll have a break for about two weeks, and then outdoor starts in about three weeks."

Rovelto said that at this point in the season the athletes have to understand individually how to prepare for their events, and he must coach each athlete differently.

"It's a little bit different with every kid — it's a very individual thing what they need to do to get ready to perform at their best," Rovelto said. "It's a team sport, but each individual is doing different events and operating on a different schedule. They just have to do what they got to do."

Cats look to better conference record with ISU matchup

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team hits the road Saturday against No. 19 Iowa State, playing the Cyclones for the second time in two weeks.

K-State, 6-7 in conference play and 13-10 overall, takes on Iowa State, 10-3 in the conference and 18-5 overall, and is looking to bounce back from a 57-54 loss against Colorado on Wednesday.

K-State coach Deb Patterson said the loss puts the team in a tough situation now with only three games to play.

"This might be the most challenging game scenario we have faced all year," Patterson said. "We're going on the road trying to find a new rhythm and playing a team in a battle for first place."

Against Colorado, the Cats shot just 31 percent from the field. As a team, K-State had nine assists and committed 17 turnovers.

Still, the Cats were in the ball game until the end, losing 54-57.

"The thing about it is, we held a Big 12 opponent to under 60 points, shot only 30 percent from the floor, and still from the four-minute mark on, we had a chance to win the ball game," Patterson said.

Less than two weeks ago, the Cats defeated Iowa State 70-63. Iowa State is battling for a conference title and is in second place as a result of the game.

"They are playing for first place in the league and are currently in second place, because we put them there," Patterson said.

Iowa State is undefeated at home this season, and Patterson said the Cyclones are playing good basketball.

"They are playing excellent basketball, which is proven by their 8-3 conference record," Patterson said.

Patterson said the key for K-State to beat Iowa State is shutting down Stacy Frese. Frese leads the Cyclones in scoring with 17 points per game.

"Defending Stacy Frese is the key to anything you do defensively against Iowa State," Patterson said. "She is the engine that makes the Cyclones go."

The Cats continue to play without forward Angie Finkes, and Patterson said the team has trouble adjusting when their remaining post players get into foul trouble.

When either Olga Firsova or Nicky Ramage get in foul trouble, Patterson said it forces the Cats to move forward Brandy Harris out of position.

"Brandy is able to produce, but collectively it changes the game for the rest of our players," Patterson said. "Instead of 24 or 25 plays, we are pigeon-holed to four or five."

Harris said playing the three or four position is not that much different for her and is part of the game.

"It is a little different, but when you play the three or four you just have to adjust," Harris said.

Patterson said she is looking for her team to step up and play against Iowa State.

"We got much better managing the game against Colorado," Patterson said. "But we're still not at the point where our posts and our guards are comfortable."

Looking to contain the Cyclones

Rebounding key to achieve victory over Cyclones

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

Having dropped its must-win game against the Kansas Jayhawks on Wednesday night at Lawrence, the K-State men's basketball team now must prepare for the Iowa State Cyclones, who stand at 14-12 overall and 5-8 in the Big 12 Conference.

"Sure, KU was an important game for us," Ayome May said following the loss at Kansas. "Now we'll go home and get ready for another tough game against Iowa State at home."

The Cats, who are 16-10 overall and 5-8 in the Big 12, will face the Cyclones in a matchup at Bramlage Coliseum. Iowa State is a team they already defeated 67-62 in a comeback affair in Ames, Iowa, on Feb. 6.

K-State's win over the Cyclones in Ames was just the second-ever Big 12 Conference road victory for the Cats and their first of this season.

"We've played pretty well at home this season," Cats assistant coach Mark Fox said. "We beat them on their home court, but that's no guarantee that we'll beat them in Manhattan. We feel confident playing them at home. We need to get back on the winning track here."

One of the keys to stopping the Cyclones lies in containing Marcus Fizer, who is averaging 17.7 points per game as the second-leading scorer in the Big 12. The last time the Cats faced Fizer, he single-handedly kept the Cyclones in the game by ripping the Wildcats for 21 points, making 11 of 18 at the free-throw line.

Fox said the Cats need to limit Fizer's trips to the charity stripe to win the game and sweep the Cyclones.

"He had to take a lot of shots to his production," Fox said of Fizer's five-of-17 shooting in the first meeting. "We want to try not to give him a parade to the foul line again. We can't let the foul line be as big a factor as it was in the first game."

The Cyclones also have two other players averaging in double figures: Martin Rancik and Michael Nurse are posting 10.5 and 10.3 per contest, respectively.

Fox said he feels the best way to stop the Cyclones and Fizer is to do a better job of rebounding the ball.

"The key is obviously stopping Fizer, but an even bigger task at hand is doing better on the defensive rebounds," Fox said.

"If we do that, it will give us a better chance to win the ball game."

For the Cats, junior guard Cortez Groves has been the only player in double figures, averaging 10.5 points per game. Juniors Tony Kitt and Josh Reid average just less than 10 points per game at 9.9 and 9.6 points per contest.

A bright spot for the Cats has been the return of May as a regular starter. Since May's return against Texas on Jan. 16, he has been averaging 10.6 points per game.

"He's played pretty solid since being back in the starting lineup," Fox said. "He's been pretty consistent, and hopefully he can continue that for the rest of the regular season and into the Big 12 Tournament."

Baseball team looks to finalize lineup as Big 12 Conference play draws near

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Wildcats, (2-5), begin their only weekend homestand of the season today with a doubleheader against Iowa at noon followed by a contest with Air Force on Saturday and Sunday. Both games start at 3 p.m.

The Cats will face an opponent playing in its first contest of the year, as was the case with every team K-State has played thus far.

"Since this is Iowa's first game, we don't know a whole lot about them," head coach Mike Clark said.

"They have some good starting pitchers with quality arms, but hopefully since it will be their first start, they may not have their control, so when they make mistakes, we need to capitalize on them," he said.

Pitching mistakes from the Wildcats were almost nonexistent in K-State's 10-0 victory over York on Tuesday. The Cats' hurlers combined to pitch a shutout while compiling eight strikeouts and no walks.

Despite the team's performance, assistant coach Mike Hensley said he still doesn't have the staff at the level he wants.

"We knew this would be a three-week process to prepare our pitchers for Baylor next week," Hensley said. "But I'm not satisfied with where they are right now."

The games against Iowa and Air Force will be used to finalize the Wildcat starting lineup for the beginning of Big 12 Conference play next week.

To complicate matters, senior closer/outfielder Andy Silva will see time as a position player only during the homestand and junior third baseman Travis Andre' will rejoin the team after this weekend.

Silva is continuing rehabilitation after being injured in an automobile accident and has begun to throw off of a mound, but he isn't quite ready to assume his role as closer.

He originally was expected to be out five to six weeks but has made his way back to the diamond in two weeks.

"Andy has wanted to go 110 miles per hour, but right now we're being cautious with him," Hensley said.

"He's really put himself in this situation — he made the doctors change their minds about when he could return," he said.

The return of Andre' sets up a competition for starting spots in the infield. Andre' could see time at third base, first base or as a designated hitter.

Sophomore Mark English is hitting .333 while playing first base so far in the season, and freshman third baseman Brett Reid is third on the team with a .318 average.

Reid, who has impressed the coaching staff as a pitcher, will start for K-State on Sunday against

Air Force, perhaps adding to the rotation of senior Brandon Peck, who will start the first game today; and junior Jason Wells, who will start the second game today.

Senior Derek Andersen, who will start on Saturday.

"We knew what Brett was capable of," Hensley said. "He was one of our top three or four guys in the fall. He deserved an opportunity to start."

The current homestand is the Wildcats' only stay in Manhattan longer than two games for the rest of the season.

"It's real important that we take advantage of this opportunity," Clark said. "Hopefully our fans will come out. It's going to be real difficult for people to keep track of the team in the next month."

ESPY Awards honor athletes of the year, inspiring columnist's approval, suggestions

NEFF

Since I left you last Friday, a lot has gone on in the sports world. I was most excited about the National Ballroom Dancing Competition. Unfortunately, it was televised at 2 in the morning. I swear, I tried to stay up, but I just couldn't do it.

So I went to Bob, the Collegian's ballroom dancing analyst, but he was getting plastered in Aggieville during the competition. To all the ballroom dancing fanatics out there, we apologize — there will be no ballroom dancing coverage today.

Luckily for the rest of you, other stuff happened this week, like the ESPY Awards. A quick rundown on the winners goes like this.

Breakthrough athlete of the year: Randy Moss. Yay, Randy.

Comeback athlete of the year: Eric Davis. Yay, Eric.

Dramatic performance of the year: David Wells' perfect game. Yay, David.

Outstanding performance under pressure: Mark O'Meara at the Masters. Yay, Mark.

Showstopper of the year: Mark McGwire's 62nd home run. Ditto.

Coach of the year: Joe Torre. Yay, Joe.

Female athlete of the year: Chamique Holdsclaw. Yay, Chamique.

Male athlete of the year: Mark McGwire. Yay, Mark.

Baseball player of the year: Mark McGwire. Ditto, again.

Football player of the year: Terrell Davis. Boo.

Men's basketball player of the year: Michael Jordan. Yay, Michael.

Women's basketball player of the year: Cynthia Cooper. Yay, Cynthia.

Hockey player of the year: Dominik Hasek. Yay, Dominator.

College football player of the year: Ricky "only 43 yards against K-State" Williams. Ha!

Men's college basketball player of the year: Antawn Jamison. Yay, Antawn.

Women's college basketball player of the year: Chamique Holdsclaw. Yay, Chamique.

Men's golfer of the year: Mark O'Meara. Yay, Mark.

Women's golfer of the year: Annika Sorenstam. Yay, Annika.

I'm getting sick of writing "of the year," so from here on out it will be omitted.

Men's tennis: Pete Sampras. Yay, Pete.

Women's tennis: Lindsey Davenport. Yay, Lindsey.

Auto racing: Jeff Gordon. Yay, Jeff.

Men's track and field: Maurice Greene.

Yay, Maurice.

Women's track and field: Marion Jones. Yay, Marion.

Boxing: Oscar De La Hoya. Yay, Oscar.

Jockey: Kent Desormeaux. Who?

Bowling: Walter Ray Williams Jr. Yay, Walt.

Soccer: Zinedine Zidane. Yay, French guy.

All that's fine and dandy, but I think they forgot one. The ESPY for the person who needs to work on their interview skills goes to the Sacramento Kings' guard Jason Williams. Every single question asked of him in an interview was responded to with a phrase beginning with, "I just go out and play hard." Example: "Jason who cuts your hair?"

"Well, I just go out and play hard, and all you can hope for is that the barber does what he is supposed to do."

"Jason, what color is your car?"

"Well, I just go out and play hard and hope that my green car doesn't get scratched."

It just hurts my head listening to him talk. So, I took a break and went to Bob to get his reaction on the winners.

"That Walter Ray Williams Jr. sure can bowl. And that Kent Desormeaux, wow, he can ride a horse with the best of them. That is what jockeys do, right? They ride horses, right?"

Wow. Indeed, you've got to be born with the kind of commentary skills Bob has. You just can't train that sort of eloquence.

The Sound of Freedom

Fort Riley is preparing an element of almost 4,000 soldiers for NTC in April, Battalion Commander Lt. Col. John Tisson said. The soldiers go to NTC because of the realistic and quality training offered.

"The National Training Center is the most highly resourced training location the United States Army has," Tisson said. "It's the most realistic training that can be provided to soldiers short of national conflict."

The soldiers at Fort Riley go through heavy training to be ready for NTC, Price said.

Soldiers practice engaging the enemy at great distances and in a variety of situations. They get experience with tanks, different weaponry and other equipment.

Current exercises include platoon gunnery, an exercise where up to four vehicles shoot targets all at once. This exercise uses tank gunnery and Bradley infantry fighting vehicles, Tisson said. The loud booms from these vehicles are most likely what people around campus often can hear.

Fort Riley has several shooting ranges, including a multipurpose range complex, where soldiers can fire almost any weapon to gain experience.

Soldiers fire 9 mm pistols, M-16 rifles, M-60 machine guns, anti-tank AT-4 weapons and MK-19 grenade launchers, Tisson said. They also can fire weapons from tanks, helicopters and other equipment.

"We have to fire various weapons systems to keep our proficiency," Price said.

The soldiers participate in activities that prepare them for wartime situations.

"We try to simulate a war scenario as much as we can," Price said.

Some of the weapons systems used to train with at the post are infantry units, armory units and artillery units, said Maj. Jeffrey Wingo, Fort Riley public affairs officer.

"It's necessary that we have these large-caliber systems to engage the enemy at maximum-effective ranges to protect American lives," Wingo said.

Wingo said the soldiers learn skills and techniques for protecting and defending the nation.

"It's incredible to see them at work," Wingo said. "It's incredible what they can do."

Specialist Christopher Kautz, a tank driver, said the training is realistic and often can be an adrenaline rush.

"We learn how to fight on the battlefield, we learn strategy and how to attack the enemy," Kautz said. "As long as you know what you're doing, there's no reason to be scared."

While at NTC, the soldiers will experience several kinds of weapons training, Wingo said.

Two scenarios at NTC are a firing exercise that replicates an enemy force advancing toward the soldiers and a maneuver phase where soldiers use tanks and laser simulation, Wingo said.

"It's like laser tag for tanks," Wingo said.

The Sound of Fort Riley

Although weapons training procedures are necessary to give soldiers the experience they need, the loud sounds made by the guns can be distracting for people who live near the base.

Price handles noise and vibration complaints from areas surrounding Fort Riley.

He said he gets around 20 complaints a year, depending on the weather. The weather affects the acoustics and the distance the sounds can travel, he said.

There are several noise and vibration monitors set up around the community to help monitor the levels, Price said.

"We try to stay as much in compliance when we're training," Price said.

Lt. Chris Howsden, a platoon leader responsible for 15 men during tank exercises, said the noise level from the guns isn't a big problem in Manhattan.

Howsden lives in Manhattan, and he said he doesn't hear many complaints from the people of Manhattan about noise from the post.

He said he does get questions about what the noises are.

People in Manhattan often hear the tanks blasting single, loud shots. But people closer to the post hear a variety of gun sounds. They even feel the vibrations of the blasts, which rattle windows and doors.

"It's pretty loud sometimes," said Doug Horner, a civilian target device repair worker and computer operator at the post.

Horner lives in Wakefield, about 10 miles from the post. He said residents of Wakefield learn to get used to the noise from the guns.

The residents often can hear machine guns and tanks. Horner said that when the Bradley infantry-fighting vehicles shoot they sound like someone is knocking on his door.

The noise level depends on the direction of the wind, the barometric pressure and how low the clouds are, Horner said.

Horner said the soldiers sometimes shoot until 4 a.m., which can make it difficult for the town's residents to sleep.

To help with the noise around the post, Fort Riley stops shooting Saturday evenings through Sunday at noon so people can have a peaceful Sunday morning for church and other activities, Maj. Dave Hubner said. It also doesn't shoot on holidays.

"The people of Riley are very supportive," Hubner said. "A lot of them work on post."

The Theory of Sound

There are several theories as to why the gun sounds can be heard at great distances from Fort Riley.

Larry Weaver, professor of physics, said he thinks there might be a continuous chunk of rock that runs under the land around Fort Riley and Manhattan that can transport sound from the guns.

"The rock shakes over at Fort Riley, and it travels here and shakes," Weaver said. "The sound would travel a lot faster through the rock than through the air."

John Harrington, professor of geography, said he thinks the valleys in the area would interrupt any such rock layers and prevent sound waves from traveling far.

"The waves that go out from the explosions are compression waves, and they actually move through the atmosphere, not through the ground," Harrington said.

Harrington explained why the gunfire can be heard at some times better than others.

He said hearing the gunfire is just like hearing thunder. When the atmosphere is stable and the layers of air are just sitting there, Harrington said, sound waves will travel better.

If the atmosphere is cloudy or unstable, he said, the sounds will not travel as far and will not seem as loud. Thunder sounds more rumbled and distant the more unstable the air is and the farther away the storm is, he said.

The clearer the atmosphere, the better able we are to hear the gunfire from Fort Riley, he said.

It's important that training goes on despite the noise, Price said, because the soldiers must be trained properly in case of a national emergency.

"The last thing we want to do is put young men and women in harm's way when they haven't been trained," Price said.

Handgun bill leaves committee

■ House is likely to begin debate, vote next week.

By DAVID MILES
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After considerable debate, a House committee on Thursday endorsed a bill that would allow Kansans to carry concealed handguns.

The endorsement sent the measure to the House for debate and a vote, likely next week.

The bill, which was endorsed on a vote of 15-6 by the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, would authorize the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to issue licenses allowing people to carry concealed handguns starting Jan. 1, 2000.

Applicants would have to be 21 or older, complete a weapons safety and training course and have no history of mental illness or drug and alcohol abuse in the previous five years. In addition, applicants could not have any felony convictions or be subject to a restraining order.

Gov. Bill Graves vetoed a similar bill in 1997 and said last week he has not changed his position.

Rep. John Edmonds, R-Great Bend, made a motion to table the bill because of the likelihood of another veto.

"This bill is dead-on-arrival," Edmonds said. "In the interests of efficiency and economy of government, we should not be wasting our time and the taxpayers' money debating a dead issue."

Edmonds' motion failed, as did amendments to water down the bill.

One such amendment was offered by Rep. John Faber, who proposed allowing local governments to keep their own laws on concealed handguns. The bill would preempt local laws.

Faber said Graves would be more likely to sign a bill that allowed cities and counties to retain their laws on concealed handguns. Graves mentioned local autonomy as a concern when he vetoed the 1997 bill.

"If you want to even have a shot at getting this law passed, in any form, you're going to have to have this provision in it," Faber, R-Brewster, said.

Rep. L. Candy Ruff, D-Leavenworth, who requested the bill, objected to having a multitude of laws across the state.

"The whole idea of concealed carry is that it must be consistent," Ruff said. "You can't have 105 gun ordinances for people who might want to be going from one place to the other."

"IN THE INTERESTS OF EFFICIENCY ... WE SHOULD NOT BE WASTING OUR TIME AND THE TAXPAYERS' MONEY DEBATING A DEAD ISSUE."

The committee rejected Faber's amendment and an amendment by Rep. Rick Rehorn, D-Kansas City, to prohibit someone from carrying a handgun into another person's residence without the home owner's permission.

"I don't like guns," Rehorn said. "I don't want someone coming to dinner at my house packing a weapon."

The committee rejected Rehorn's amendment 11-10, with Chairwoman Susan Wagler, R-Wichita, casting the deciding vote.

Highway plan pushes back tax relief

By CARL MANNING
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The wheels fell off the tax-relief wagon in the House Taxation Committee on Thursday, and its chairman said he won't try to repair it until lawmakers decide on a plan to improve the state's transportation system.

The decision to put tax-relief legislation on hold made sense because legislators have competing choices of spending more money or reducing state revenues by cutting taxes, House Speaker Robin Jennings, R-Healy, said.

"From our standpoint, it's good to go with transportation first. That was our original idea. The folks are ready to talk transportation and that's encouraging," Jennings said.

"We'll have a better understanding of what folks want in — then you'll know if you can have tax cuts and how much," he said.

He said the House next week will take up a transportation bill that would require $2.1 billion in new revenue over eight years to finance. Under the plan, the money would be available to fund it from projected revenues, and there would be no tax cuts for several years.

After crafting a five-year, $715 million tax-relief package Wednesday, the Taxation Committee was ready Thursday to vote on sending it to the House for debate ahead of the transportation plan.

Rep. John Edmonds, R-Great Bend, balked at the price tag and offered his version amounting to some $235 million over five years.

The committee voted 12-10 to support his proposal over the heavier version it had crafted one day earlier.

"My attempt is to present an alternative that leaves room for highways," Edmonds said.

After the vote, Chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, who favored the $715 million plan, moved to other committee business, preventing a vote on whether to send Edmonds' proposal to the House floor.

"The message I got from the committee is they didn't want to take action on tax cuts until after transportation has been resolved, and that's what I'm going to do," Adkins said.

Adkins said he wasn't surprised by the outcome, and previously said the higher-priced plan was based on the assumption that no transportation plan would pass this session.

Edmonds' plan included Graves' proposals for eliminating the oil severance tax; increasing income tax credits on property taxes for business machinery and equipment; doubling income tax credits for people who adopt; and sales tax credits for improving grain elevators and short-line railroads.

He also proposed cutting the statewide school mill levy rate from 20 to 19 — one mill less than the committee agreed on Wednesday — expanding the food sales tax rebate program and providing sales tax relief for disaster victims.

The committee turned down a plan to exempt the first $4,000 of a vehicle's value for property taxes.

On Wednesday, it rejected Graves' proposal to phase out the property tax on vehicles.

CLIF PALMBERG/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Golf course major has variety of classes

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Take turf management, add business management, mix it with hotel and restaurant management and season it with communication. This is the recipe for K-State's new golf course management major.

The program began last semester with 30 students. This spring the program has about 50 members, excluding transfer-students from the former turf management course.

"We created a prototype in United States that other universities might follow," said Jack Fry, associate professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation and the new program's adviser.

Middle Tennessee State University and Texas A&M have shown interest and ordered background information about one of the university's latest additions.

Four faculty members from three different K-State colleges put the program together. They worked closely together with the golf industry to match the needs of potential employers.

"Would I be back to college, I certainly would take golf course management," said Dave Fearis, superintendent at Blue Hills Country Club in Kansas City, Mo., and vice president of the Golf Club Superintendents Association of America.

Fearis said the GCSAA supports and advises the program. He said personal management, a well-grounded finance knowledge and communication skills are vital to be a successful superintendent.

"Golf facility maintenance is far more than mowing the grass," Fearis said.

Requirements for the major are 17 hours of communication, 12 hours of social science, 18 hours of business management and 12 hours of hospitality courses.

With 32 hours, the scientific background of turf management forms the backbone of the curriculum.

"With this educational background, students can also market themselves as a general manager," Fry said.

A general manager oversees the whole operation of the course, restaurant, hotel or shop facilities.

The golf industry has boomed. About 400 golf courses were built last year in United States, Fry said.

"The opportunities are out there to get an entry-level position. It should not be a problem," Fry said.

Garrett Luck, senior in golf course management, commutes each week between Kansas City, Mo., and Manhattan.

"I went to K-State because of this program," Luck said. "I work already as a superintendent for a golf club in Kansas City, and my employer recognizes the benefit of the program."

In addition to the course work, students have to complete a six-month internship. During the first three months, students will get turf management experience. The second three months of the internship has to be completed in the business, management or hospitality side of a golf course.

Colbert Hills, a golf course under construction in northwestern Manhattan, will play an important role for research and golf maintenance education.

The cooperation between Colbert Hills and the new program gives students another original opportunity. They can use the golf course as a laboratory as well as a classroom. It will provide room for lectures so coursework and practical experience can go hand in hand.

The golf course was spearheaded by Senior PGA Tour Golfer Jim Colbert, a K-State alumnus. It will include a clubhouse, an 18-hole course and a driving range.

"Colbert Hills is scheduled for completion in May 2000," Don Weingartner, superintendent at Colbert Hills, said. "In the summer we will start with the first internships, which will help students get hands-on experience at the final stages of construction."

Radio station audit reveals reasons for debt

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An audit report presented to the Privilege Fee Committee on Sunday found KSDB-FM 91.9 to be non-compliant with several state and university policies and regulations.

Warren Strauss, director of internal auditing, reviewed KSDB accounts from fiscal year 1998 and the first four months of fiscal year 1999.

The report found Springfest '98, which incurred a loss of more than $52,000, was not the only reason for the station's debt. The audit examined a vehicle lease, telephone expenses, KSU Foundation accounts, underwriting contracts, schedule of charges, equipment inventory, employee time and leave reports, sales tax, expenditures, retention of records and financial statements.

The audit recommended needed changes, including better overall management of the station's operations, depositing all university receipts into a university account on a daily basis, reporting and remitting sales tax, improved employee time and leave reporting and not allowing personal phone calls made from the station to be charged to the university.

Money from A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications accounts used to pay the station manager were not reflected in the audit because that would have required an audit of the school of journalism as well.

The committee voted 8-0 to favorably send both KSDB's request for emergency funds and regular privilege fee request on to Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

The proposal for emergency funds will cover the cost of Springfest '98, the most significant item that contributed to the overdrown accounts. The regular privilege fee increase will cover a 1-year increase in the station manager's salary and some station operations.

"I really don't know what we should do," Nick Mueting, senior in management and college of business senator, said. "I think sending it to Senate is the best thing we could do right now. There's going to be a lot of questions on it. Right now this is a package deal, fix the problem and don't let it happen again."

In other business, the committee: ■ Approved a resolution to show student-government support for increased library funding, 8-0.

The resolution requires the state to match all money given to the library by students. According to the resolution, this funding must be supplemented with continued funding from the Foundation, Library Endowments and Sponsored Research Overhead.

■ Heard a proposal from Recreational Services to continue its current privilege fee funding.

Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said the continued funding is important to college enrollment.

"The quality of life that Recreational Services helps to provide is an issue in choosing a college," Robel said.

The recreational services privilege fee budget was set for $350,996 for the next three fiscal years and the replacement reserve budget continuance was set for $9,609. Both were passed 8-0.

More than 200 file for spring SGA elections

By ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Filing for Student Government Association 1999-2000 general elections ended at 4 p.m. Friday. The number of candidates who filed was higher than it had been in five years, according to SGA records.

More than 200 student candidates filed this year. Most of the number of candidates filing for Senate seats for each college doubled from last year's filings.

Colleges such as Agriculture, Arts and Sciences, Business Administration and Engineering had more than three times as many applicants file as positions available. College Councils had more than 100 students file for positions.

There are seven tickets for student body president and vice president and 148 candidates for the 60 Senate positions.

Coordinator of Student Life Gayle Spencer said one of the reasons for the increase in filings was the current Senate going out to the residence halls and living organizations, and talking to students about what senate is and does.

"This year the Senate went out to areas around campus and spoke about the Senate, the role it has on campus and the current issues on campus," Spencer said.

"They went to these different organizations encouraging people to run," she said.

Senate Vice Chair Jake Worcester said shorter and more productive Senate meetings also helped gain the interest of many K-State students.

"SGA has had a good year with the press, and they also have been more efficient with their meetings," Spencer said. "There isn't an overwhelming time commitment."

Spencer said three main components contributed to the response. They included the election advertising, the personal aspect of educating people as to why they need to serve and what kind of opportunities exist.

Spencer said postponing the deadline one week later

Survey finds students dissatisfied at K-State

By JINA HIPPE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Seventy K-State students were sent out to find the opinions of other K-State students.

Students in the class, Human Needs, conducted surveys to get the opinion of K-State students on a variety of topics. Students were given an assignment of finding out what's on the minds of others.

The survey concluded that many students said they feel like a number, and that the university fails to offer one-on-one attention.

"This was a matter of looking at divergent attitudes and beliefs of students at K-State," said Virginia Moxley, associate dean of human ecology and co-instructor of the course.

Heidi Peterson, sophomore in business, asked students to use an adjective to describe their feelings about K-State and to explain why they felt this way.

Of the 13 students surveyed, only three used a positive adjective to describe K-State. "Difficult," "unattended to" and "disappointed" were some of the words used to describe students' experiences at K-State.

Peterson said the students she surveyed were concerned that they were only one of many.

"A part of K-State's recruiting techniques are that K-State gives one-on-one attention to students," she said.

"A lot of the students that I surveyed, and myself, don't feel that this is the case," Peterson said.

It's not all

Some students have found a job that routinely subjects them to verbal abuse.

Officials for intramural team sports must make quick decisions and often must deal with complaints from players and fans, said Ron Miller, assistant director of recreational services.

"You have to be confident and be able to sell your call," said Brian Briggeman, junior in agribusiness and an intramural official. "I've been on both sides of intramurals and know people are going to holler. You just have to accept that and go on."

Recreational Services advertises for officials before each season. Depending on the sport, there are two or three training meetings for those interested, Miller said.

"The first meeting is a general rules meeting. In the second one, we actually go out on the field or court and go over positioning and those kinds of things," Miller said. "There's really not a lot of training, considering what we ask people to do."

Miller said he is willing to train anyone, but having an idea of how the game works is helpful.

L.J. Sedlacek, senior in Spanish and modern languages, said she had a good understanding of basketball and softball, but had to concentrate more on learning the other sports.

"In the practice sessions you get a little experience, but it really doesn't prepare you for the first time on your own," Sedlacek said. "It's a little nerve-racking the first time, but once you know what you're doing out there, it gets easier."

Miller said there has been a shortage of officials. In football, 45-50 officials are needed, but there have been as few as 30. In basketball, there are 45 officials instead of the recommended 65.

Officials' paychecks come from privilege fees that students pay for recreational services. Miller said he challenges people to come out next year and help increase the number of officials.

"It's a lot of hours for the number of officials, and they get worn out and the game gets old," Miller said. "By the time play-offs roll around, they're tired of working and taking abuse."

Miller said problems can occur if intramural players place unrealistic expectations on the officials.

"People are used to yelling at officials," Miller said. "You go to a K-State game at Bramlage and yell at an official who could be a 30 to 40-year veteran. If they're not good enough to satisfy you and you come here and have the same expectations of someone who may have only worked 10 games, that's not fair."

Briggeman, who is officiating his first basketball season, said basketball is the most demanding sport to officiate.

"Everybody is right there," Briggeman said. "It's so quick, and a lot of it is judgment calls."

The familiarity of basketball also makes it difficult to officiate, Miller said.

"It's the game that people understand the most," Miller said. "They think if you understand the game as a player, you also know how you would officiate the game. Knowing the game and seeing a call, seeing a foul and making a call all in an instant is a different story."

The intramural atmosphere, where there usually is not a coach, can make handling individuals more difficult, Sedlacek said.

"In other game situations, if someone is fouling or getting out of hand, there's usually a coach to pull them out," Briggeman said.

"Here, there's not really a figurehead," Sedlacek said. "Players often contribute their opinions."

When they don't have a coach, you have between five and 12 people all giving opinions on what should have been called," Sedlacek said.

Albanians, Serbs still holding back on Kosovo settlement

By BARRY SCHWEID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMBOUILLET, France — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, making scant headway toward a Kosovo peace settlement, said Sunday that if neither Serbs nor ethnic Albanians accept the six-nation plan, NATO cannot carry through on its threat to attack Serb targets.

With a new deadline set for Tuesday, Serb negotiators are not engaging over the question of whether NATO peacekeepers would enforce the settlement, while the Kosovo Albanians must still be persuaded to sign on fully with the plan to give them greater autonomy in the Serb province, Albright said.

"They are dealing, and I think we have to appreciate this, with decisions that affect their lives," Albright said. "It is a question of war and peace for them. I think we need to understand the difficulty of the decisions that they are making."

Albright will return to this small town southwest of Paris on Monday for more talks with the ethnic Albanians, a senior U.S. official told The Associated Press.

Albright declined to explain what was holding up Albanian approval. In fact, she said, U.S. officials thought the Albanians had given her a green light on Saturday.

But other U.S. officials said the renewed negotiations focused on the Albanians' quest for independence after the plan's interim three-year period, and U.S. refusal to endorse independence. Albright, ruling out any independence referendum in the agreement, said she was looking for a way "the voice of the people" could be expressed in Kosovo.

"If this fails because both parties say no, there will not be bombing of Serbia and we will try to figure out ways of trying to deal with both sides," she said.

However, Albright said that if the Albanians give their total endorsement to the complex plan — which would give the majority Albanians significant autonomy but stop short of independence for Kosovo — and if the Serbs keep holding out, then the Serbs would be attacked.

"The Serbian side is not cooperative. The Serbian side believes that it can have half the deal, which is to talk about the political part of the document. ... There is no deal and no cooperation if they are not willing to engage in what is a basic aspect of the agreement," she said, referring to the NATO peacekeepers.

Albright's spokesman, James P. Rubin, said she left U.S. Ambassador Christopher Hill — the U.S. special envoy to the talks — to continue negotiating with the Albanian representatives.

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook also tried to put pressure on the ethnic Albanians to accept the agreement.

"If you don't sign up to these texts, it is extremely difficult to see how NATO could then take action against Belgrade," he said to the British Broadcasting Corp.

German Foreign Minister Jodyhka Fischer, at a European foreign ministers meeting in Luxembourg, ruled out another extension of the peace talks. "There will not be another extension," he said.

Albright, on CNN, took a much more sympathetic tone with the Albanians, saying "their lives are in the balance," but restated the U.S. opposition to granting them full independence.

"What we really need to do is to focus on this interim period, help them to really make sure that the various instruments that are part of this agreement that has local elections, local police, the possibility of schools that teach the Albanian language ... plus a presidency and a constitution, that we ought to focus on making those institutions real," she said.

Albright met for three hours with Albanian leaders and then for nearly an hour with Serbian President Milan Milutinovic.

The U.S. officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the negotiations centered on trying to find a way not to foreclose the option of independence in the agreement.

Albright told CNN that Milutinovic, reiterating the position of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, said Serb resistance to the agreement's call for a NATO peacekeeping force was due to concern for the Serbs and other minorities in Kosovo.

Albright said her next move own plans were up in the air. "I have made no decision how long I will stay here," she said.

8-year transportation plan wouldn't require new taxes

TOPEKA — Members of the House Transportation Committee settled last week on a plan and sent it to the floor for debate on Tuesday.

The proposal would create an eight-year transportation program that requires no bonds to be issued or taxes to be increased to pay for it.

It would require $2.1 billion in new revenues over the eight years — money that would come from normal revenue growth.

"At some point, we're going to have to come together and decide how much tax cuts and how much transportation we can afford," Speaker Robin Jennison said.

"The governor is still very interested in car (property) tax reduction," he said. "If he had his druthers, he'd like to see us use some bonding and continue to drive down the car taxes."

Phasing out property taxes on motor vehicles doesn't get a lot of legislative support, Jennison said. He said there isn't nearly as much pressure from the public for additional car tax reduction now that those taxes have been cut in half from the tops-in-the-nation level of five years ago.

"There is just political pressure to do other things that have gotten people's attention," Jennison said.

The Senate is waiting to see what the House does with the transportation bill, President Dick Bond said, but it will get high priority in his chamber because "the governor has pushed transportation to the top of his agenda," he said.

This is the year to get a new road plan, Bond said, because there is enough flexibility in the state's finances to do it now and this is not a year when legislators are seeking re-election.

Bonding a portion of the transportation program, Bond said, "is the way to go," because of extraordinarily low interest rates.

"You're only going to get a truckload of gravel in 2000," Bond said.

Film critic Siskel, 53, dies following brain surgery

CHICAGO — Film critic Gene Siskel, known for the thumbs-up and thumbs-down reviews he and Roger Ebert shared on their popular TV show, died Saturday. He was 53.

Siskel had surgery in May to remove a growth from his brain, but returned to the syndicated television show "Siskel & Ebert" soon afterward. He announced earlier this month he was taking time off from the show to recuperate.

He died surrounded by his family at Evanston Hospital near Chicago.

"Gene was a lifelong friend, and our professional competition only strengthened that bond," Ebert said in an interview with WLS-TV. "I can't even imagine what it will be like (without Siskel)."

Siskel wrote movie reviews for the Chicago Tribune and also did reviews for "CBS This Morning" and WBBM-TV in Chicago.

He had said when he announced his leave on Feb. 3 that he expected to return to writing his reviews and the TV show this fall.

"I'm in a hurry to get well because I don't want Roger to get more screen time than I," Siskel said then.

CONGRESSIONAL INTERNSHIPS IN WASHINGTON D.C. AND KANSAS!

Meet informally with Senator Pat Roberts's Aide,

VanNest, Olson pledge to focus on library, salaries in election

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Two more students have added their names to the elections ballot for student body president and vice president.

Justin VanNest, senior in political science, and Amanda Olson, freshman in fine arts, announced their candidacy Friday in the free-speech zone.

VanNest said he and Olson looked at a lot of issues concerning K-State and came up with four issues on which to focus.

The first issue on their platform is funding for Hale Library.

"We feel the library is one of the main priorities we should be looking at," VanNest said.

Hale Library is $4 million behind other Big 12 universities, and the University of Kansas has double the books, journals and funding, VanNest said.

He also said some K-State professors recommend their students go to KU to do research because they can't get their research done at K-State's library.

The second issue that VanNest and Olson said they are emphasizing is faculty salaries.

Olson said K-State is 12-percent behind the national averages for faculty salaries.

"K-State has a hard time recruiting new faculty and keeping faculty," she said.

VanNest said they are going to lobby the state Legislature for higher faculty salaries. He said their goal is to see what they can do to help the current faculty members and to recruit new faculty members.

The third issue on VanNest and Olson's platform is a review of the privilege fees. VanNest said it is important for students to know where their privilege fees are going.

VanNest said that he and Olson are going to review whether privilege fees are being spent wisely and are going where students want them to go.

"The largest portion of privilege fees go to Lafene Health Center. They're keeping the cost down by this privilege fee," he said. "It's a well-used portion of privilege fees."

However, VanNest said other parts of the privilege fee could be better spent.

For example, VanNest said students give $15,000 a year to Bramlage Coliseum, yet it also is funded by ticket sales and other revenue.

The last issue VanNest and Olson want to address is campaign finances.

"There's no inclusion for clothing, so anyone can go out and spend all the money they want on shirts and hats," VanNest said.

For future elections, VanNest said he wants to make it easier for anyone to run, not just students with a lot of money.

VanNest and Olson said they decided to run for student-body president and vice president because they thought K-State needed leadership from outside the regular loop.

VanNest said they plan to make themselves open to everyone.

"I will listen to any and every concern, no matter how small or insignificant it may seem," he said.

Elevator workers say safety inspections overlooked in blast that killed 7

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Two workers who were burned seriously in an explosion at a DeBruce grain elevator said management pressured them to cut corners on safety.

In a story published in The Wichita Eagle, Sunday the workers said they signed attendance sheets for safety meetings they didn't attend and were told to sign inspection checklists for equipment that was never inspected.

Seven people died and 10 were injured when the elevator just south of Wichita exploded June 8.

Workers Johnny Sutton and Scott Mosteller said they decided to speak out after Paul DeBruce, the company's president, told a national trade magazine and The Kansas City Star that his company was committed to making safety its top priority.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration has charged DeBruce with 36 counts of willful and serious violations of federal safety regulations at its elevator in Haysville. The civil charges carry fines of up to $1.7 million and possible criminal prosecution.

An administrative law judge is to call a hearing in the case before making a ruling. No date has been set for hearing.

DeBruce disputes a $55,000 fine OSHA levied for the company's alleged failure to have safety meetings.

He told Milling & Baking News and The Kansas City Star last month that he increased safety meetings from monthly to weekly sessions. According to DeBruce, there were 12 safety meetings between Jan. 20, 1998, and April 15, 1998.

The company turned over employee-signed attendance lists to federal investigators as proof, DeBruce said.

Mosteller said he could recall only a two-month stretch during DeBruce's ownership when there were regular meetings. He said he felt pressured by management to sign attendance sheets more than once and did so when he was told the safety meetings would be held sometime in the future.

Mosteller said he did as he was told because management "had a way of making things hard on you and giving you crummy, crummy jobs."

Sutton and Mosteller told OSHA investigator about the lack of safety meetings in sworn videotaped testimony.

DeBruce spokesman Dennis McCulloch said Friday that company officials were not aware of the workers' statements, because OSHA has refused to show them its evidence.

"This is the first time we have heard of it," McCulloch said. "Our people say it didn't happen. ... We have other employees who, under intense questioning from OSHA's attorneys, denied that — to the extent one complained later he really felt like he was being reamed because he wasn't telling them what they wanted to hear."

In interviews, DeBruce said he spent $900,000 on housekeeping, safety, productivity and other upgrades in the 18 months he owned the elevator. DeBruce said that included hiring workers whose sole duty was to keep the facility free of dust.

Grain dust can be as explosive as dynamite, so OSHA requires grain elevators to limit the amount of dust on floors and equipment to one-eighth of an inch in the elevator's central tower.

Sutton, whose job was to weigh grain, said keeping the elevator free of dust became less of a priority as he and others worked 90-hour weeks to keep up with ever-increasing loads of grain.

"In my experience, there was increased production creating a great deal more dust with less time for us to maintain or clean anything," he said. "There would be periods of a week at a time when no cleaning would take place."

Dust accumulated up to 18 inches and covered the tops of his shoes, Sutton said.

An investigator hired by OSHA has said that the blast started in a tunnel when a bearing on a conveyor belt seized, causing a roller to freeze as well.

The roller wore away as the belt continued to move over it. That friction caused the roller to get hot enough to ignite the explosive grain dust that had collected on the moving belt.

Paul DeBruce has dismissed that theory. He said he hired a Chicago-based engineering firm to recreate the blast. It found that the friction between the roller and the belt could not have generated enough heat to cause the grain dust to ignite.

McCulloch said that if dust levels were as severe as Sutton described, workers should have cleaned it up and reported it to management.

OSHA also has proposed fining DeBruce $280,000 for not maintaining safety equipment properly.

Sutton said he was told to inspect parts of the elevator to see whether certain safety equipment was working.

When he told a supervisor he was not trained to inspect such equipment, Sutton said he was told to go ahead and mark them as having been inspected and OK, knowing that they had not been inspected.

McCulloch said the equipment had been inspected. Two sensors were repaired between December 1997 and January 1998, he said "and they had to be inspected for us to know they needed repair."

DeBruce has said the company repaired and upgraded the dust-control system, but Sutton said that even after repairs were made to the dust-control system, "it was not functional a large part of the time."

The elevator was particularly dusty the day it blew up, he said. Sutton said he discussed the problem with Howard Goin, one of the workers who was later killed in the blast.

"He told me as I was going to my work area that it would be dirty because they had been operating over the weekend with the dust system down."

NCAA punishment fits K-State's 'crime'

It sounds trite, but the NCAA's ruling on the football team's recruitment violations proves that honesty is the best policy.

Because the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics was upfront about the violations incurred with running back Frank Murphy, the NCAA responded lightly and only extended the department's probation for a year.

It could have been much worse. If the athletic department had tried to cover up the violations or had denied any infractions, the NCAA probably would not have responded so favorably.

The NCAA also recognized that the university would have had a difficult time averting the situation. The individuals who had provided money to Murphy had no real connection to K-State as boosters. They just took it upon themselves, as football fans, to recruit Murphy. Justifiably, they now will be unable to aid the university or enjoy privileges beyond those available to the general public.

Some would argue that K-State should see no penalties at all, since the individuals were not affiliated with the university officially. On the contrary, the ruling confirms no one should be able to give favors to athletes. Essentially, anyone who wears purple could damage the athletics program. The probation sends a warning to such individuals that next time it could cost the football team much more.

Athletes, and apparently the general public, should never forget the rules of recruitment. Athletic ability will do the team no good if it's from the bench, or worse, playing while already eliminated from postseason play.

The example set by the athletic department is a good one to follow. Recruiting should be honest, upfront and fair. Most of all, it should be legitimate.

The invisible K-State

Nancy, Jim, other employees do the jobs most of us don't even think about Man, we need a new basketball coach.

Has Pamela Vander Pol ever been to a K-State basketball game? Probably not.

In response to the other day's reader who said all greeks should leave K-State to the real students, I think everyone who lives in the dorms and doesn't live in fraternities should have to leave campus, and see where that leaves us.

With regard to R.A. Hartman's columns about "The X-Files," most people know that's fiction.

Two things in response to Tom Clarke's column on Thursday: First of all, the Rev. Jerry Falwell actually did not make that statement — it was his publicist. You need to get your facts straight. Also, Leviticus 18 is very specific about that.

Lurking behind the grill in the Union Stateroom is a very friendly face. It belongs to Nancy, a woman responsible for the best biscuits and gravy in the civilized world. She's happy to whip up a breakfast with a steady and practiced hand, no matter how abruptly, rudely or incoherently the patron spits out an order.

"Don't forget your syrup," she reminds me as I receive my French toast, wishing me a nice day with a cheerfulness I can't approach without medication or delirium. At 7 in the morning, this is exactly what I need: a delicious breakfast, some paint-stripper coffee and a reminder that there is life after the snooze button.

Meet the other side of K-State. It doesn't get or give grades, and it's still an integral part of this university. No, not the squirrels. It isn't between students and faculty; it's not even in the educational spectrum. It's the K-State staff, the most under-appreciated part of our campus.

Some amateur mathematician is taking a look at the educational equation (instructors plus students equals education) and saying, "Hrm, I don't see where these people fit in. We can do just fine without them." Uh-huh. Do you see your department head cleaning the restrooms? (Well, you might, given the state's attitude toward faculty salaries.)

There are real jobs to be done on this campus, and there are some pretty spiffy people doing them. Nine times out of 10 you don't notice them; that's their nature and a testament of their success. It's tempting to think of the staff as the grease that makes the machine run smoothly, but that's a gross disservice.

Your department can do without its students for a few days (but let's not give them ideas). Your department also can do without faculty for a bit. ("Gone to a symposium on bovine physics in Maine, be back in October. Love, Dr.

Moo") Imagine the department surviving without the department secretaries.

One of the first lessons I learned at K-State was that, while the deans were impressive and important, the people who wield power to rattle the foundations of heaven are the secretaries, the office managers — the staff. Yet they're subordinated in their omnipotence because they're not saturated with academic ambitions and isolated in ivory towers. They have a job to do; it's just that simple. They don't have to be praised to the skies to perform to the top of their ability.

Good thing, too, because they never are.

The miscellaneous faces who make up this campus proletariat have a number of thankless tasks. They could be the person who slipped the parking ticket under your windshield wiper (or called for our friend, Mr. Wheel-lock), or maybe they're the person who had to clean up the Dr Pepper you spilled in the basement of Eisenhower Hall and snuck away without tending to. They haul off the 3-day-old sandwich you chucked into a wastebasket. They keep the bowling alley running. They mow the lawn. And we never said thanks.

There's a plaque in Nichols Hall, just inside the main entrance, honoring the "Facilities Crew of the Quarter," an honor well deserved. There's a team of custodians keeping Nichols Hall one of the most elegant and pleasant buildings, not just on campus, but in the state, and it deserves all the kudos that come its way.

There's a man lurking in the basement of Kedzie Hall. We call him Jim. He's the newspaper's own Hephaestus, forging in print and paper what the students only theorize. Not only is he dangerously resourceful and extremely skilled at his job, he's a good man to know — not only for his personality, but if Jim wants something to get done, it will be done. If Jim wants water to run uphill, well, the taps in Kedzie get a little weird for a little while. (And if Jim doesn't want something to get done, good luck in ever seeing it happen.)

It's tempting to cordon off the "employees" of K-State into their own little area, dismiss them with a comment of, "Oh, they're only staff." This ignores the fact that the paid employees beyond the faculty are the superstructure upon which this campus is built. Perhaps the student-instructor is the raison d'être for academia, but it's just not possible without a staff, and it's a living hell without good people working beside us every day.

Students struggle under their class loads and wither under the scrutiny of grades. Instructors have hundreds of papers and tests and miles of paperwork. Sometimes the staff of K-State is the only element capable of keeping things from completely falling apart.

It's hard to realize, much less openly acknowledge how vital a role they play on our campus.

But it's better than finding out only after it's too late to say "thank you."

But that's a story for next time.

Two-party system of government not a true reflection of today's society

We are not a government of the people. We are a government of dirty politics that does not reflect upon the people of this country.

Most political discussion makes my skin crawl — I have that much of a physical response — and therefore, I don't choose to write about it. But the politicians have pushed me too far, and I exercise my right to complain about the way they do and do not run things and the governing system of the people that does not reflect the population of this country.

First of all, the two-party system should be tossed in the American gutter.

Over the weekend a new acquaintance asked me, "What are you? Republican or Democrat?" My reply was a simple, "I am Mary, a person who does tend to have more liberal views but is not tied to a political group."

VIEWPOINT

Why should I put myself into a category that doesn't have any real definition anymore?

I shouldn't have to register for one party or the other when a person's political party is not a real reflection of what they stand for or who they are. I really don't think two parties can be representative of a group of people with such differing views. There's a political sliding scale within each party — members of the Democratic party who might as well be Republicans and Republicans who might as well be Democrats.

I'm neither Republican or Democrat. I'm open to all suggestions from all people. Two main groups for a whole country of people — it seems impersonal to me. Politicians, in putting a label on themselves, belittle their individual opinions.

Can't we just vote for people? Hear their opinions, and then vote for them. In doing away with this system, we could cut out on a lot of the crud that goes on in politics today. For example, in the last few months we've seen senators voting with their party just so they can win over the other party in the Clinton trial. Politics wasted our money and our time.

I don't think we really have a say anymore about anything in this endless political cycle.

First of all, everyone knows that the majority of Americans don't vote. No one votes, and therefore, our government is not a reflection of the views of the American people.

No one votes because people don't feel their vote counts, and though the optimist in me would like to believe that this isn't true, the pessimistic Mary knows that the individual's opinion really doesn't matter too much in this grand country.

Letters are written and ignored. A form letter is sent, signed by a secretary or a rubber stamp. Polls are taken and ignored. The omnipotent congressman votes as he pleases, consoling himself that he is representing the people who voted him in and the people whose letters he ignored.

I'm using the masculine pronoun a lot in this discussion, which brings me to the next point that our government doesn't represent the people because our elected officials are predominantly white men from wealthy families. These men, no matter how hard they try to put themselves in the shoes of others, will never be able to fathom any kind of discrimination or the frustration of poverty.

Congress is not on our side. Congress is not on my side because I don't have any money to shove in its face. Congress votes with its supporters, and I'm not talking about the letter writers. I'm talking about the people with the big bucks who give money so their interests are supported.

Congress is not on my side because it votes with a group instead of listening to me or to their intelligent self that I voted for.

We were founded the a wonderful idea that the people would count. Somewhere down the road, we lost our way.

If only we could overthrow the corrupt, coed fraternity that is the two-party system and make America a government run by individuals, not followers. Unfortunately, the two-party government has made its own rules and regulations to ensure that its reign will never cease and it will never be without a political identity or political corruption.

We aren't a government run by the people any more than I am the Easter Bunny.

Jennifer McEntire, sophomore in interior design, received similar results and said she agreed with some of the students she surveyed.

"Less than half of the people gave positive responses," she said. "One of the more common answers I got was that people said they felt like a number here."

Moxley used a national study of college students' experiences as a basis.

"We discussed the book, 'When Hope and Fear Collide,' in class and looked at the needs of college students," she said.

"This set the stage for students going out and doing research," Moxley said.

Students conducted their research in different ways. Some sent e-mail to randomly selected students; others used the phone or asked students in person. Students in the class were able to pick their own sample size, Moxley said.

She said it is possible that some of the results could be biased.

"There could have been a negative bias in the way that students asked the questions," she said. "Each of them might have taken their own problem and gone out to see if other students have the same problem."

Mandy Hatcher, junior in family services and consumer education, asked 20 students to use an adjective to describe their feelings. The findings did not surprise Hatcher, she said.

"Most of the students in my survey said they were stressed or tired," she said. "I feel that this is an overall view."

The least-frequent response Hatcher received was "happy," but she said she thought the survey was a good assignment.

"It helped me learn what other students think and helped me realize that some of the students feel the same way I do," she said. "It also allowed me to talk with other students who I wouldn't normally approach."

Moxley said some students did not get a representative or diverse sample, but she still thinks the survey showed some areas where K-State could improve.

"I hardly think you can send 70 students out all over campus and come back with an overall picture that is not fairly close to the tenor of what is going on," she said.

"We promote K-State as a caring place, but there are a lot of students who don't perceive their experiences this way," Moxley said.

Moxley said the results of the survey were surprising, but beneficial to her.

"As an associate dean, I'm ready to go out and make some big changes in the way we teach and construct curriculum," she said. "It's pretty clear that there are a lot of students that feel what we are trying to do is not working to their full advantage."

With this substantial amount of interest by the students, Senate Chair Gabe Eckert said he hopes the excitement will carry through until the elections.

Big 12 Indoor Track and Field Championships leave men and women with fifth- and fourth- place rankings

K-State comes up short in Big 12 track-and-field meet

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Going up against some of the fastest and strongest athletes in the country, the K-State men's and women's indoor track and field team came up short in its pursuit for a Big 12 Conference title this weekend at the Big 12 Indoor Track and Field Championships in front of a home crowd at Ahearn Field House.

The women's team finished fourth in the conference meet, while the men's team tied with Missouri for fifth.

Texas won the conference on both sides, scoring 150 points on the women's side, compared to K-State's 82.5.

On the men's side, Texas outscored the Wildcats 113 - 64.

"They did some remarkable stuff" head coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"They got a 1, 2, 3 in the hurdles, which is incredible, that was one of the best team performances we've seen in a long time, they just went out and got it done."

Texas was also the favorite on the women's side going into the meet, but Rovelto said he was just pleased that his team finished in the top third of the conference.

Highlighting the women's side of the meet were Renetta Seiler and Anna Whitham, who won the top two spots in the shot put.

Seiler grabbed the title with a throw of 66 feet, 7 inches, and Whitham threw 62 feet, 11.2 inches.

"They made a very strong statement that they were clearly the best two girls in the conference," Rovelto said.

Providing 28 points for the men's side of the event were the multi-event athletes, who earned the first, second, third and fifth spots in the event.

Attila Zsivoczky set a Big 12 record and earned his second-consecutive Big 12 title with his first place score of 5,702.

Rovelto said this particular group of athletes has a great deal of potential.

Some athletes said they were disappointed with K-State's performance, which for some was their last meet at K-State, as the Cats are not hosts of any more outdoor meets this season.

"I really would have liked to give the home crowd something, but you do what you can do, and I did my best today," high jumper Charles Burney said.

Burney placed third in the high jump behind two jumpers who previously had jumped higher than him this season.

Rovelto said he was not surprised by this outcome.

Distance runner Zach Davies said he might have run his mile race a bit differently, but overall he was satisfied with the meet and his showing.

Rovelto said that overall, the majority of his athletes have improved over the course of the season and some still have more opportunities ahead of them at the NCAA nationals.

"To be among the top half of a conference that's unquestionably the best conference in the country, I'm tickled to death," Rovelto said.

"I think the kids and staff really did a great job to make it happen."

Seiler grabs Big 12 title

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State women's weight and hammer thrower Renetta Seiler stepped up under pressure Saturday in the Big 12 Indoor Track and Field Championships at Ahearn Field House.

Seiler, a senior, stepped into the ring for her third and final preliminary weight throw after scratching her first two throws and facing the prospect of missing finals.

But on her third throw, Seiler, the defending champion in the event, kept the weight between the lines and threw 19.9 meters, qualifying for finals.

"It was probably the most nerve-racking throw I've ever had," Seiler said. "I have never been so nervous in any meet, any throw, at any time."

The throw gave Seiler the lead, and she never gave it back. Seiler finished up a busy weekend by winning the Big 12 title.

The day before, Seiler set a personal record in the indoor shot put, throwing 51 feet, 3 inches and placing second.

"Timing-wise, everything was pumped up," Seiler said. "We really worked on it in practice lately, my rhythm was on, and Coach said I just had to hit at the end, and that's what I did."

Throughout the Big 12 Indoor Championships, Seiler said she was able to draw energy from the crowd.

"Everybody was throwing really far, it was exciting, everybody was screaming and yelling, we've never had this much attention," Seiler said.

K-State assistant track and field coach Steve Fritz said Seiler had been making positive progress in the shot put and he was pleased with her performance.

"She had been doing better in practice, we knew she had the potential, but it was just a matter of when it clicked in the meet," Fritz said.

The personal record in the shot put came on her fifth throw, the second throw in finals. Seiler said that after preliminaries it was difficult to come back for the finals.

In four years at K-State, Seiler has made her mark. Her best all-time weight throw of 69 feet, 2 1/2 inches is a school record. Seiler also has been a consistent scorer for the outdoor team in discus and hammer events.

Reid sparks Cats to overtime victory, 64-58

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State junior guard Josh Reid scored nine of his team-high 17 points in overtime, leading the Cats to a 64-58 victory Saturday over the Iowa State Cyclones at Bramlage Coliseum.

With the score tied 49-49 at the end of regulation, Reid started the five-minute overtime period with a three-pointer and proceeded to score seven straight points for K-State, (17-10 overall, 6-8 Big 12 Conference.)

"That's probably the best time to provide a spark," Reid said of his overtime performance. "Coming off that three, I was thinking about that the whole time when he called out that play that I was going to get a good shot coming off that screen."

"I just raised up and hit it." The Cats knew that to win the game they would have to contain sophomore forward Marcus Fizer of Iowa State, (14-13 overall, 5-9 Big 12), who, averaging 17.7 points a game, ranked second in the Big 12 in scoring.

Despite Fizer's game-high 18 points Saturday, K-State coach Tom Asbury said he was pleased with the effort his team put forth in guarding Fizer, who hit nine of 10 free-throw attempts.

"I thought we did a pretty good job," Asbury said. "We had a number of different guys on him, and I thought we did a reasonably good job on him. He only goes four for 13, only gets four buckets on us, and he's really a good player. He's a tough player."

The Cats trailed 4-0 to open the game, but Reid and junior guard Cortez Groves quickly put the Cats ahead with back-to-back three-point baskets.

Then, trailing 17-12 with 7:49 to go in the first half, Reid, Shawn Rhodes and Josh Kimm sank three-pointers on successive trips down the floor, giving K-State a 21-20 lead.

Senior forward Manny Dies and freshman forward Travis Reynolds built on that lead, adding two-point buckets of their own and helping the Cats to a 28-26 halftime lead.

K-State led most of the second half, until Fizer made two free throws that gave the Cyclones their first lead of the second half, 45-44.

Rhodes came up big for the Cats after they lost the lead late in the second half. He quickly gave them a 47-45 lead on his third three-point basket of the day.

"Rhodes was huge," Asbury said. "He had no hesitation at all, because he was fresh enough, so much of Shawn's perimeter game is how his legs are late. As we all know, most of his threes come in the first half, when he's got his legs under him."

"And yet he finds himself wide-open and he's got enough confidence to shoot it. He just nailed it."

K-State point guard Chris Griffin had a chance to make it a four-point lead with 1:16 to go when he took a charge and went to the free-throw line. Griffin missed both tries, giving the Cyclones another chance.

After Michael Nurse's two-point bucket tied the game at 47-47, with a minute left, Griffin made a floating layup in the paint for the 49-47 lead.

The game was sent into overtime when Nurse went to the line with 15 seconds left in the game and made both shots, forcing the overtime.

K-State, seventh in the Big 12, still is forced to play for position in the conference in preparation for the Big 12 Tournament in March.

"We can't sit back and look at this win too much," Reid said. "It's the same thing with KU. We couldn't get down about that game, too. We just have to carry this into the next game and play well down to the end."

Cats fall to Iowa State in weekend loss, 53-86

BY CHUCK SCHOFFNER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMES, Iowa — Stacy Frese scored 15 of her 22 points in the first half, and Desiree Francis added 15 points and 10 rebounds as No. 19 Iowa State beat K-State 86-53 Saturday night.

A crowd of 8,520, the largest ever for a regular-season game at Iowa State, saw the Cyclones, which are 19-5 overall and 11-3 in the Big 12 Conference, shoot 58 percent in a dominating performance.

Megan Taylor scored 14 points for Iowa State after getting only two in the first half, and Angie Welle had 13.

K-State, which had upset Iowa State 70-63 at home on Feb. 10, shot only 36 percent and was out of the game by early in the second half. It's record is now 13-11 overall, 6-8 in the Big 12.

Olga Firsova led the Wildcats with 14 points, and Nicky Ramage scored 13.

Frese had scored only eight points in the first game with K-State, but she matched that total less than eight minutes into Saturday night's game.

TODD STEWART/COLLEGIAN

Even when it comes to baseball draft picks and free agency, mothers always know best

VIEWPOINT

McEMORE

Reflecting on the current status of the Kansas City Royals, I'm reminded of something my mother always used to say: "You know, signing a young pitching star to a team of mediocre players doesn't help much, especially when that pitcher hasn't played in quite a while and will be sent to the minor leagues for God knows how long where he can spend his exorbitant signing bonus that takes up too much of an already small budget."

Honest, she always used to say that. And, of course, she's right. Mothers always are, especially when it comes to draft picks and free agency.

However, even though my mom was right, the Royals seem to be overlooking her wisdom in their state of blissful euphoria. On last Wednesday, the Royals finally signed their top 1998 draft pick, Jeff Austin, a pitcher fresh out of Stanford in sunny Palo Alto, Calif.

Although drafted fourth overall in June (that's right, June), Austin had held out looking for a better contract and a larger signing bonus.

This week, Austin gave in to his desire to play and signed with the Royals so he could start spring training. This is all fine and dandy, but unfortunately, Austin's presence might not have as large of an effect as the Royals want or need. He hasn't pitched in a competitive game since his season finale at Stanford. Although he could have spent this summer playing baseball, he instead took the advice of his agent, Scott Boras, and stayed home.

Thank you, Scott, Herk Robinson, Royals general manager, has said Austin's idleness likely will land him a job in the minor leagues. This will leave some big holes in a starting rotation that lost its best starting pitcher when Tim Lincecum became a free agent and signed with Anaheim.

Sure, the boys in blue were able to keep reliever Jeff Montgomery for at least one more year and have the successful reliever Scott Service. However, you can't put all of the burden on your relievers. You have to have a solid starting five who can bring the relief crew into the game with a lead. Of course, the term "lead" assumes that you have a couple of hot bats in the lineup.

One quick glance at the projected starting lineup for the Royals makes me think of anything but "hot bat." I'd be happy with at least a lukewarm bat or two. Don't get me wrong, the Royals have some guys who can get on base, but they need some guys who have consistency.

This is a lineup that barely hit more home runs as a team last year than Mark McGwire did by himself. That's not exactly comforting.

Nevertheless, Herk Robinson still seems to be optimistic about the possible pitching situation. He said that if you mix Dan Reichert, a hot prospect who has overcome injury, with Jose Rosado and Glendon Rusch, you'd have a "young" pitching staff.

Here's the problem, Herk. "Young" isn't always associated with "good." More often, "young" is associated with things like immaturity, inexperience and high school proms. This young starting rotation will have a lot of potential, but potential isn't something I'm willing to bet on right now.

An even larger problem is that the young, potential-filled Royals players of today often become the older, better, moving-to-a-new-team-because-they-can-give-me-more-money-players of tomorrow. The Royals have become a virtual farm team for the teams with deep pockets. The Royals break in the new players and let them grow, and then they are whisked away by promises of big paychecks. How do you spell small market? K-A-N-S-A-S C-I-T-Y, that's how.

Until the Royals can land a solid veteran player who is willing to stick in Kansas City for more than a few seasons, the team always will be laughable. It's a sad state of affairs when your team goals include "not being in last place" as opposed to "winning the division." The truth is, a division title is possible. The Cleveland Indians have a good team, but they're no Yankees.

I have nothing against Austin. I'm sure that he will become a fantastic pitcher. In fact, I'm almost positive that he'll be in a Royals uniform and in the starting rotation before the end of July. I'm also positive he won't be the cure-all that the Royals need.

He won't be the one to bring the fans back to a newly remodeled Kauffman Stadium. He won't be the guy to pull the Royals out of the cellar. That is exactly what scares me about the hype around Austin.

The Royals might have won this battle, but in the whole scheme of things it looks like this year will be yet another Royal disappointment. At least, that's what my mom thinks.

And you should believe her. After all, mother knows best.

Allied warplanes attack missile base

By WAJEL FALEH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. and British warplanes attacked an Iraqi missile base and two military communication sites Sunday after Iraqi jets violated the no-fly zone, the U.S. military said.

There was no immediate word on damage or casualties from the strikes near al-Amarah and Tallil, about 170 miles southeast of Baghdad. All the planes returned to their base, a statement from the U.S. Central Command said.

The statement said the strikes were launched after two Iraqi jets violated the zone in southern Iraq. There was no immediate comment from Iraqi officials on the attack.

American and British planes patrolling the no-fly zones over southern and northern Iraq regularly have clashed with Iraqi defense and aircraft. Iraq has said it does not recognize the zones.

Earlier Sunday, the official Iraqi News Agency said Iraqi air defenses might have shot down a Western military plane in southern Iraq. The United States and Britain denied any planes were lost. Iraq has made several claims in the past about shooting down Western planes, but none of them has proved to be correct.

The zones were set up after the 1991 Gulf War to protect rebel Shiite Muslim groups in the south and Kurdish guerrillas in the north from Iraqi government forces.

The Western planes patrolling the two zones are based in Saudi Arabia and Kuwait in the south and Turkey in the north.

Also Sunday, the government announced that President Saddam Hussein had sent a letter to Arab League Secretary-General Esmat Abdel-Meguid urging "a new page" in relations with the Arab world.

The appeal followed a fence-mending trip by Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf to eight Arab countries from North Africa to Syria and the Persian Gulf.

"Iraq is ready to open a new page in Arab relations on condition that Arab countries come out with a united stance against the aggression and sanctions imposed on Iraq," Hussein wrote in the letter, state-run Iraqi radio reported.

Hussein called for the league to delay a March 14 meeting of a committee created to study the Iraq situation until there is Arab reconciliation. He said such a meeting must "come out with a united position, with no doubts from any party," the broadcast said.

The committee was set up last month after Arab League foreign ministers refused Iraqi demands to condemn U.N. trade sanctions and the mid-December airstrikes by the United States and Britain on Iraq. Iraq's delegation walked out of the session in anger.

Hussein expressed Iraq's willingness "to participate in any Arab meeting, whether it is on leaders' level or other levels, to discuss all issues ... to improve Arab relations," the broadcast said.

It did not say when the letter was sent or if there was a response.

K-State, KU set to battle for blood

■ K-State will try to collect more units of blood than KU, as it did last semester.

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Registration for next week's blood-drive competition between K-State and the University of Kansas begins today.

"Last spring, KU edged us out," Mark Barkman, K-State blood-drive coordinator, said. "We served them back a pretty good beating."

■ MORE INFO? Registration is from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., Monday through Wednesday in the K-State Student Union and 6 p.m. to 9 p.m. Monday and Tuesday in Chesters E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Cross Blood Services Donor Resource consultant.

Donors who are taking antibiotics must be off the medication for two days and feel well before they can donate, she said.

"We hope to bring home the point that blood is needed every day," Powell said. "The donated blood will be used by over 100 hospitals."

"WE HOPE TO BRING HOME THE POINT THAT BLOOD IS NEEDED EVERY DAY."

— NANCY POWELL,
AMERICAN RED CROSS BLOOD SERVICES
RESOURCE CONSULTANT

Only 1 percent of all blood donations is sent out as full blood. Most of the time it is divided into three components — plasma, platelets and red cells.

Chemotherapy patients need to take platelets to stop internal bleeding. However, they have a shelf-life of only five days.

Plasma is needed to help burn victims and red cells are used during surgery.

"The demand for blood varies from day to day," Powell said. "Next week, K-State will provide the greatest percentage of blood to the Kansas and northern Oklahoma region."

All blood donors will get a small check-up, Powell said. American Red Cross employees will measure vital signs like blood pressure, temperature and pulse rate. A questionnaire will ask for possible diseases or unwelcome medications.

"The health screening also includes the determination of the iron level, which can make you aware of a potential deficiency," Powell said.

Four to six weeks after the donation, participants will be notified of their blood type.

"The competition is a good way to excite the people about blood donation," she said. "Three or more patients can benefit from one unit of blood."

The American Red Cross Blood Services needs to collect 392 units every day to match the need of the Kansas region.

"It is a pretty easy way to help other people," said Susan Gormely, K-State arts and sciences instruction support adviser. "I did it several times. You can survive it."

Regents create admissions requirements

■ Beginning in 2001, incoming freshmen must meet 1 of 3 standards.

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new qualified-admissions plan will make it more difficult for students to be admitted to K-State or any other Kansas Board of Regents school next year.

The plan, which will be implemented in 2001, will require incoming freshmen to receive a score of 21 or higher on their ACT test, graduate in the upper one-third of their class or maintain a 2.0 grade point average based on a core curriculum. Two years of a foreign language, a computer class and several other classes also will be required to comply with the plan, which was set by the regents and the Kansas Legislature.

A student who does not meet any of these requirements still can be admitted under an exception policy meant for students who show potential and would benefit from education. Ten percent of the freshman class can be admitted under this rule.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said he did not think the change would be noticeable to the university.

"We've done a lot of research and compared our students now to the future requirements," Moeder said. "We've found that the majority of our students were already achieving these standards in high school. This shouldn't change anything too dramatically."

Kansas was the last state to change from an open-admissions policy to qualified admissions.

Barb Conant, communications director for the regents, said the change is because of the belief in Kansas that all students should have the opportunity to receive higher education.

"In Kansas we have always sort of believed it is everyone's right to go to college. With our new policy we're really not changing this," she said. "We just want our students to be prepared for university life or vocational school or even for a job. We think the new policy will do this."

The main purpose of the qualified admissions policy was preparation, Conant said.

"This is going to effect the students much more than the schools. The additional classes will prepare the students for life after high school," she said. "This will hopefully decrease the number of remedial classes needed in col-

Making the grade

Requirements set up by the Kansas Board of Regents will create standards of admission to K-State and other regents universities. To be admitted to a regents university, students must meet one of three requirements.

- 1. A student must have a score of 21 or better on the ACT
- 2. A student must have a grade point average of at least 2.0 based on the regents' core curriculum
- 3. A student must place in the upper one-third of the graduating class

An exception policy will allow 10 percent of the incoming class to be admitted without meeting the standards. It is meant for students with potential who would benefit from higher education.

Station audit finds $57,000 loss for Springfest

Station manager leased vehicle with station funds.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSDB-FM 91.9 is operating with a debt of about $30,000 after incurring losses from Springfest '98 and mismanagement of funds.

Warren Strauss, director of internal auditing services, and two other auditors, conducted an audit of the radio station over a three-month period. The audit indicated changes should be implemented by the current staff of the station.

"We looked at all the financial records such as the time/leave documents and invoice records, and then indicated changes that needed to be made," Strauss said.

According to the audit, which reviewed records from the 1998 fiscal year through the first four months of the 1999 fiscal year, $52,571.12 was lost on Springfest '98, a concert sponsored by the station last May.

Jeremy Claeys, program director for Wildcat 91.9 and junior in mass communications, said he thought the cost of advertising and the booking of last-minute bands set the cost of the concert at more than the estimated $18,000-20,000. He said Tone Loc cost $7,000-10,000 to bring to K-State.

"I don't think we will ever do something like this again because it is an event that doesn't go over very well in an area like Manhattan," Claeys said. The audit said no budget outlining expected revenues and expenditures was made and no contracts for the 12 bands brought to Springfest '98 could be located.

Read the full text of the audit on the eCollegian at collegian.ksu.edu.

ed. Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communication, said the audit indicated 565 tickets were sold for Springfest '98, but 1,100 were given out complementarily.

Simon said if the tickets that were given away had been sold, the amount of revenue would be around $20,000, which would have covered the estimated budget.

"Many invoices didn't appear until after the new fiscal year had started," Simon said. "In June, I thought I was done with Springfest, but invoices still were coming in."

Although the debt incurred by Springfest '98 was the largest part of the deficit, it was not the only reason for the station's debt.

The audit showed that in January 1998, the station manager of KSDB, entered into a three-year lease of a 1998 Nissan Pathfinder. For the vehicle to be used for university business, the lease must be signed by a university official. A fraudulent invoice was used to pay $499 of the down payment for the vehicle. Len Potillo was station manager at that time.

Simon said that although there are no records documenting who was driving it, Potillo had possession of the vehicle.

"I believe the vehicle was used for some station business, although there was not a log to keep track of what the uses were or who used it," Simon said.

According to the audit, telephone expenses for the 1998 fiscal year totaled about $7,600, a 50-percent increase compared to the previous three years. It was determined the increase was because of personal calls made by station employees on four cellular phones.

SIMON

One phone had charges for incoming phone calls totaling more than $1,500. Simon said he canceled all of the phones except one last fall, and a second phone has been added recently. He said use is limited to station business such as a live remote or a broadcast of a sports event.

Claeys said cellular phone codes now are changed each month and only the talk-show producer and the station manager, Candy Walton, have access to the codes.

"We are paying now for things that were cut for the huge expense that almost destroyed the station," Claeys said.

Simon said some of the debt was paid out of the station's KSU Foundation account, which is where donations from alumni to KSDB are kept. The remaining balance of the debt is between $24,000 and $30,000. An exact number cannot be given because there are still expenses that will need to be paid over

Audit highlights

An internal audit that reviewed records of the 1998 fiscal year through the first four months of the 1999 fiscal year revealed instances of mismanaged funds.

1. The station lost $52,571.12 at its Springfest concert May 9, 1998.
■ Booking the bands cost between $18,000 and $20,000. Tone Loc alone cost between $7,000 and $10,000.
■ There were 565 tickets sold for the event, and about 1,100 were given away complementarily.
2. Spring 1998 station manager Len Potillo entered into a three-year lease of a 1998 Nissan Pathfinder with station money, but the contract was not signed by a university official.
3. Telephone expenses totaled about $7,600 for the 1998 fiscal year, which is a 50-percent increase compared to the previous three years.
4. The station now is operating with a $24,000 to $30,000 debt.

Bill would create 'super' board to replace Regents

By LEW FERGUSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents would be dissolved and replaced with a new "super" board to oversee and coordinate all facets of higher education in the state under a bill approved Monday for introduction.

It likely still would be called the Board of Regents, those who developed the Senate plan said. But Chairman Ralph Tanner of the House Education Committee said it might get another name.

Tanner also said the House version probably would have a financial component, which the Senate bill doesn't.

The new board would assume responsibilities for community colleges and vocational-technical schools, now supervised by the State Board of Education, leaving that body with sole responsibility to administer elementary and secondary education.

The measure will be introduced in the Senate as soon as it is ready. The House Education Committee is expected to work with it as well, scrapping a plan developed late last year by a task force appointed by Gov. Bill Graves.

The bill, proposed by Senate Majority Leader Tim Emert, R-Independence, and Sen. Christine Downey, D-Inman, ranking minority member of the Senate Education Committee, was approved for introduction by the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee.

That panel is one of a handful that still can introduce legislation this session, now at its halfway point.

The task force plan left the regents and Board of Education intact but created a new coordinating board and a new board of trustees

Researchers, class compare notes on student opinions

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two faculty members who have done extensive research on student concerns are interested in the results of a class project that showed some students are dissatisfied with K-State.

Research was conducted by 70 students in the Human Needs class, taught by Virginia Moxley, associate dean of human ecology, and Olivia Collins, interim assistant dean of human ecology. The survey was based on the opinions of hundreds of students about K-State on a variety of topics, Moxley said.

A story in Monday's Collegian confused some readers when it highlighted "13 students surveyed" for the project. But Moxley said that the 13 responses were only from the work of one student. Each of the 70 students obtained some responses for the project. One student used about 150 e-mail responses as part of the project, Moxley said Monday.

Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said he wasn't happy to hear that students had complaints, but that the students should have used better methodology if they wanted the results to be taken as fact.

"From what I understand, the methodology they used is a joke, particularly at an institution of higher learning," Bosco said. "But my day is ruined when one student has a problem with K-State."

Moxley said the project was never intended to be a scientific, stratified research project. Instead, she said, students were asked to gather input from others on campus and use the information to get a general idea of how students feel.

Moxley said several staff members expressed interest after Monday's Collegian story, including two who wanted to find out more about how to fix what students perceive as

After 3 weeks of calling, Telefund nears $1.1 million donation goal

By JINA HIPPE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

More than 1,000 students have volunteered at the KSU Foundation Telefund, and $838,573 has been raised in three weeks to go toward student scholarships and other educational programs.

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving, said the Telefund is on track to meet its goal of $1.1 million.

"Things look positive," he said. "We've had tremendous participation from students, alumni and friends."

Dowell said another goal of the Telefund is to become the No. 1 school in the Big 12 Conference based on alumni support. K-State currently ranks third in the conference and seventh in the nation in alumni giving.

"We've been able to involve a lot of alumni and friends, and that's essential if we want to reclaim the conference lead," Dowell said.

Students in the College of Business Administration had four nights to make calls to alumni.

Cherie Hodgson, academic adviser in the College of Business Administration, said the college set a goal of raising more money than it did last year during the Telefund. This year, they have already raised $131,587, which is an increase from last year's figure of $108,000.

Hodgson said students should be eager to donate their time to the Telefund.

"Students should participate in Telefund because the money goes directly back to them," she said. "It's a good opportunity for students to visit with alumni, and it's a lot of fun." About 200 students from the College of Business Administration participated in the Telefund, and 75 percent of the college's callers were new to the event, Hodgson said.

Deadline looms in struggling Kosovo peace talks

By BARRY SCHWEID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMBOUILLET, France — With a new deadline imminent and the Serbs refusing to budge, ethnic Albanians met Monday night to decide whether to accept a self-rule plan for Kosovo, designed to end their yearlong long conflict.

They were told beforehand by Gen. Wesley Clark, the NATO commander, that a NATO peacekeeping force would ensure their security in of event an agreement being reached.

New fighting, meanwhile, broke out between Serb forces and ethnic Albanians. The threat of NATO airstrikes against Serbian targets hung over the talks, although Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has said NATO would not carry out the threatened bombing strikes against Serbs if the ethnic Albanians continued to object to provisions of the agreement.

Albright shuttled between the two sides Monday, and Clark flew in unannounced from NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium, for a meeting with Hashim Thaci, the political director of the Kosovo Liberation Army, which has fought a bloody war for independence with Serb troops.

Some 2,000 people have died and about 300,000 more have been left homeless in the conflict.

Diplomatic sources in Europe, declining to be identified, disclosed the meeting without providing any details.

U.S. and European mediators have pushed the ethnic Albanians to give their final approval to a Kosovo settlement. "We have tried very hard to explain the benefits of the agreement," a senior U.S. official said. "These are wrenching decisions."

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said Albright hopes to get a true sense of the ethnic Albanians' stance when she meets with them again on Tuesday.

Albright met separately with Serbian leader

Proposed bill would change current Board of Regents

TOPEKA — Citing concerns about fairness, college alumni urged legislators Monday to endorse a bill that would place at least one graduate of each state university on the Board of Regents.

The bill, which is being considered by the Senate Education Committee, would phase in new board members as the terms of present members expire. No university would be allowed to have more than two alumni on the board.

Chairwoman Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, said she expects the committee to vote on the bill Tuesday.

The board now is made up of seven University of Kansas alumni, while K-State and Wichita State University each have a graduate on the board.

"A fair and equal distribution of representation in our electorate is a basic premise of our Constitution ... This same premise should apply to the state's governing boards," said Michael Slack, president of the Pittsburg State University Foundation.

Fred Marrs of the Shocker Black and Golds, a Wichita State alumni group, linked board representation to funding.

Marrs said the board gave KU a 15-percent increase in its budget from fiscal years 1995-1998, while Wichita State received an increase of 5 percent.

"We ought to have a procedure whereby the Board of Regents is not controlled by one institution," Marrs said.

But Regent Harry Craig of Topeka said he thinks regents are fair and fears the bill could create partisanship.

"We're concerned that an atmosphere of parochialism could be fostered," Craig said.

Although a majority of senators have signed the bill, Lawrence, who sponsored the bill, said she didn't know whether it will make it out of committee.

"There is a very strong KU and K-State sentiment in this committee," Lawrence said.

KBI headquarters to expand with state appropriation

TOPEKA — A proposal to relocate the Kansas Bureau of Investigation's headquarters and increase its laboratory space received the endorsement Monday of the House Appropriations Committee.

The proposal would renovate existing buildings on the campus of the former Topeka State Hospital at a cost of $9.2 million. The committee voted to add $769,000 to the KBI's current budget to allow it to plan the renovation project.

"It was needed about six or seven years ago," said Rep. Phil Kline, R-Overland Park, chairman of a House Appropriations subcommittee on the KBI's budget.

For years, KBI officials have been asking the Legislature to allow the agency to expand its existing headquarters to a one-time junior high school in central Topeka or relocate to new quarters. The agency would like to hire nine more scientists for its Topeka laboratory but would have no space for them, Director Larry Welch said.

"It's irrelevant whether I can hire them or not — I don't have any place to put them," Welch said after the committee's meeting. "This is a good start."

The KBI has seen its lack of laboratory space in Topeka as its most critical need. Its laboratories do forensic testing for law-enforcement agencies across the state.

Kline said moving the KBI's headquarters and laboratory to former Topeka State Hospital buildings would give the agency more space more quickly. Kline's subcommittee reviewed two proposals for constructing new buildings near the KBI's current headquarters.

However, Rep. Rocky Nichols, D-Topeka, said the state should have a plan for use of the entire former hospital grounds before it approves any projects. He said he is concerned that approving projects one by one could result in a patchwork quilt of development.

"By the time we get done with it, it could look pretty ugly," Nichols said. "This decision shouldn't be made in a vacuum."

Mystery substance found non-toxic after FBI tests

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Preliminary tests on a substance purported to be anthrax that was mailed to a Planned Parenthood clinic Monday did not contain the toxin, the FBI said.

Tests were done on a stained piece of paper found in the letter. Further tests were planned to identify the substance.

A letter with a Kentucky postmark arrived in the mail at the midtown clinic. The envelope contained a substance and a letter threatening contamination, FBI spokeswoman Bridgett Patton said. She said she did not know what city the letter was mailed from.

Twenty people, including seven firefighters who responded to a call shortly after 9 a.m., went through the decontamination process in which they were washed with soap and bleach.

Anthrax can cause flu-like symptoms in humans if it is inhaled. It can be fatal if not treated early enough with antibiotics.

Symptoms can appear within six hours to 24 hours, said Brad Humston, a spokesman for the city Fire Department.

Several ambulances were dispatched along with hazardous materials units, fire trucks and police cars to the midtown neighborhood where the clinic is located. Police blocked off the area, rerouting traffic from a main street that leads in and out of downtown.

Fire officials were flooded with calls from worried people in the neighborhood. The department tried to calm the fears, saying anthrax is not contagious and direct contact is required to become infected.

The clinic has been the target of regular protests by those opposed to abortion. Protesters frequently appear on Saturday mornings to shout their message through bullhorns and attempt to discourage women from entering the clinic.

Similar letters were sent to clinics throughout the country last week. At least 14 letters that were claimed to contain anthrax were mailed to abortion and Planned Parenthood centers across the nation and were postmarked in Lexington, Ky., a Louisville, Ky., postal inspector said.

Russians could abandon Mir due to lack of funding

MOSCOW — The three new crew members who climbed aboard the Mir on Monday probably will be part of the last team on the 13-year-old space station unless Russia can find private donors to keep it aloft beyond August.

Two days after blasting off, Russian Viktor Afanasyev, Frenchman Jean-Pierre Haignere and Slovak Ivan Bella docked their Soyuz capsule with the Mir and joined two Russian cosmonauts who have been aboard for the past six months.

Russian space officials vigorously defend the reliability of the Mir and say it could continue in orbit for several more years. The station has been operating smoothly since a string of breakdowns in 1997. More than 100 men and women have lived on the Mir, which has circled Earth about 75,000 times since it was launched Feb. 20, 1986.

The Russian government says it can no longer afford the $250 million required each year to keep the Mir going, and it might be abandoned if private funds cannot be found by August.

The U.S. space agency NASA wants the Russians to discard the Mir so Moscow can spend its limited resources on building an international space station, a project involving 16 countries.

Yuri Koptev, head of the Russian Space Agency, said Monday that he was pleased with the Mir's performance, and he still held out hope that it would keep on flying. He said two crews were training to replace the current team on the Mir.

To raise cash, the Mir has taken on a series of non-Russian passengers. It cost France and Slovakia millions of dollars to send their astronauts on the latest flight.

Bella will spend one week on the Mir and then return to Earth on Feb. 28 with the Mir's current commander, Russian Gennady Padalka.

HOW TO LAND YOUR DREAM INTERNSHIP

(Even the one you didn't know existed)

If you're starting to think about your career, even just an inkling, it may be time to focus on finding a summer internship. Following are some "insider" insights about how to land your dream internship in some of today's fast-forward industries like media, entertainment, fashion and high-tech, that likely don't recruit on campus.

WHAT TURNS YOU ON?

Not the typical first question you might think of when plotting your first career experience, but you really should think about it. The best places to work are often the places that make or do things that already interest you. And who wrote the rule that work shouldn't be fun? "It helps to start by thinking about which classroom topics interest you the most and what hobbies get you excited," says Samer Hamadeh, President of Vaultreports.com and the co-author of "America's Top Internships" and "The Internship Bible," two of the most useful books on the subject. Take his advice and ask yourself some questions. Do you spend a lot of time listening to music and going to concerts? Maybe you should check out working for a local radio station, a record label or a music publishing company. Are you a devoted athlete? Try contacting a fun sporting goods company, a fitness magazine, or a sports talent agency.

CHECK IT OUT.

Below are key resources for your internship hunt, including specific listings for openings by company, industry and location.

BOOKS:

- America's Top Internships - Mark Oldman and Samer Hamadeh
- The Internship Bible - Mark Oldman and Samer Hamadeh

WEB SITES:

- www.internships.com - Comprehensive city and regional guides to internship opportunities nationwide.
- www.emmys.org/eps/index.html - If you're interested in the television world, check out this site, which posts internships available through the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences.
- www.aaf.org - For aspiring advertising and marketing execs, this is the site for The American Advertising Federation. It offers a comprehensive directory of internship opportunities in the advertising and media industries.
- www.review.com/career/find/intern.cfm - This is the "Princeton Review's" on-line database of internships. You can search for openings on a city-by-city basis, and by industry. Listings are highly descriptive, and candid.
- www.interns.org - Ideal for budding politicians, civil advocates and lawyers. The Washington Intern Foundation posts internship available both on and off Capitol Hill.
- www.inroadsinc.org - Tells about national corporate-sponsored internship programs that give preferred placement to talented African-American, Hispanic and Native American students.
- www.vaultreports.com - An invaluable way to learn more about specific companies where you may want to explore possible opportunities.
- www.collegehire.com - An awesome site for anyone who wants to work in the high-tech industry. Submit your resume and a detailed form describing your background and interests. Collegehire will e-mail you with opportunities that match your qualifications and interests.

CREATE YOUR OWN JOB

After you've asked yourself what you like, and thought of some of your favorite products and activities, you may find that many of your choices lead to smaller or less structured companies that likely don't recruit on campus, or that don't have a formal internship program. Don't get discouraged!! In fact, think of it as a huge opportunity because you can potentially create your own job! There's nothing wrong with calling or writing a company out of the blue and letting them know who you are and what you're interested in. Many of the smaller companies will be thrilled to have been approached and more than likely can use the extra hands for the summer. One of Hamadeh's favorite stories is about a college student who was interested in sports law. The guy figured that Michael Jordan's lawyer must be pretty good at it, so he read a bunch of newspaper articles until he found the guy's name, then he wrote him a letter explaining why he wanted to work for him. "The lawyer had never received a letter like that from anyone before," Hamadeh says. "So he brought him in for an interview and was so impressed that he hired him for the summer."

SELL YOURSELF, NOT YOUR NUMBERS

Just because you may not graduate cum laude doesn't mean you won't qualify for some of the most selective internship programs. "You have to make yourself sound interesting," says Price Hicks, who hooks students up with summer jobs at places like Warner Brothers as part of her work with the Academy of Television Arts and Sciences. "The guy who wrote about growing up on a dairy farm is the one we remember best." The people, who may have the best grades, but drone on and on about why they want to be television directors all tend to blend together, she says.

SCIENTISTS CAN BE JOURNALISTS

Remember that the purpose of an internship is to gain experience. The idea is to "test drive" career options that you think might interest you for your future. And what interests you for a career may have nothing to do with what interests you in school (How many psych majors actually become psychologists? How many history majors become historians? You get the point.). You never really know what someone might be looking for, so don't feel intimidated by internships that aren't directly in your field of study. Case in point, a biology major beat out a slew of journalism majors for one of three highly coveted internships at the Center for Investigative Reporting. Out of approximately 90 applicants, she was among those with the least direct experience. "It just so happened we were working on a project about chemicals in the environment, so her skills came in handy and she ended up playing a big role in the reporting," said Maryann Sargent, who is the internship coordinator at the Center.

REMEMBER THAT SMALL CAN BE BIG

Sometimes, you really may be better off going to work for a company where the duties of an intern aren't well defined. In small but super fast-growing internet companies, for instance, there's always a lot going on, so interns can often show up on day one and pick the things that interest them the most. "Our interns will always be working on several different projects," says Jeff Daniel, who runs a cool new service called CollegeHire.com that helps match up undergrads with high-tech and internet-related internships and entry-level jobs. "We look for people who can adapt well to the culture of fast-moving companies and can excel in an environment that's changing rapidly." Big change means new opportunities, and that's where a hungry intern can step into new, exciting areas and make a big contribution.

Turkey asserts right to defense

By LAURA KING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey asserted Monday it has a right to self-defense, if Greece provides support to separatist Kurds — a thinly veiled threat of military force against its neighbor and rival.

The warning came as a Turkish newspaper reported that imprisoned rebel warlord Abdullah Ocalan had told interrogators that Greece gave his fighters weapons and training, claims Greece has rejected in the past.

Ocalan, captured in Kenya a week ago, is expected to stand trial for waging a nearly 15-year insurrection in Turkey's predominantly Kurdish southeast that has claimed an estimated 37,000 lives. He could face the death penalty.

A judge is expected to bring formal charges against Ocalan on Tuesday, after the end of the seven-day period in which a suspect can be held without charges.

The hearing, expected in a state security court at the island prison where Ocalan is being detained, would be closed to the press and the public.

Ocalan has not had access to an attorney, which has drawn criticism from international human rights groups.

On Monday, a group of 15 lawyers — including several from Turkey's independent Human Rights Association — told the court they were prepared to represent Ocalan.

"We are members of a human rights organization and believe that everyone has the right to a defense," said one of the lawyers, Eren Keskin.

She said Ocalan's family had asked the lawyers to defend him.

The Ocalan affair has inflamed tensions between Greece and Turkey, both members of NATO but also neighboring rivals that nearly have gone to war several times over territorial disputes.

President Suleyman Demirel warned Greece on Monday that assistance to Ocalan's Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, could trigger a military response.

"If Greece chooses to continue with its illegal actions, we retain our right to take the necessary precautions for our right to self-defense," the semi-official Anatolia news agency quoted him as saying during a visit to Manila.

The national daily Hurriyet said Ocalan had told interrogators that Greece provided the PKK with weapons and training at a U.N. refugee center east of Athens in Lavrion, Greece, which mostly houses Kurds.

"They even gave us arms and rockets. Greek officers gave guerrilla training and explosives training to our militants," the newspaper quoted Ocalan as saying.

It did not say how it had obtained the statements, and the account could not be verified independently.

Turkey frequently has alleged in the past that Greece has provided military backing to the rebels. There was no immediate response to the latest allegations in Greece.

In response to past Turkish allegations, the Lavrion camp has been examined repeatedly by international observers, who were unable to substantiate charges that it served as a military training center for the PKK.

Greece, however, was caught red-handed sheltering Ocalan.

Just prior to his arrest, he was staying at the Greek ambassador's residence in Nairobi, and he had spent some days in Greece before that.

Turkey has insisted that Ocalan's trial will be fair and told outsiders not to interfere.

On Monday, the European Union urged Turkey to strictly safeguard Ocalan's rights.

Ocalan complained of heart trouble when he went to Italy last fall seeking asylum, but doctors found nothing. Turkey's prime minister told reporters Monday there was a three-member team of doctors, led by a cardiologist, on the prison island.

A group considered to be the political wing of the PKK, the National Liberation Front of Kurdistan, claimed the doctors were drugging Ocalan to "make him weak, drowsy and make him suffer without leaving any traces."

The group provided no evidence to support its assertion but threatened violence if the rebel leader was harmed.

"If one cell of his body is hurt ... we vow to burn the Turkish Republic with our own fire," the statement said.

"IF GREECE CHOOSES TO CONTINUE WITH ITS ILLEGAL ACTIONS, WE RETAIN OUR RIGHT TO TAKE THE NECESSARY PRECAUTIONS FOR OUR RIGHT TO SELF-DEFENSE."

Policy could affect minority enrollment

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fifty percent of K-State's minority freshmen meet the standards set by the qualified-admissions plan, whereas 85 percent of students in the majority meet the standards.

Administrators fear these figures will carry over into 2001, when the plan takes effect.

"Everything's kind of up in the air at this point," said Michael Lynch, assistant vice president of education and personal development. "What we don't know at this point is how many high school students are meeting the requirements."

The requirements include a score of 21 or better on the ACT, a 2.0 grade point average based on the regents' core curriculum and placement in the upper one-third of the graduating class.

Students seeking entrance to a Kansas Board of Regents university must meet at least one of the qualifications.

"Students tend to be meeting the 2.0 requirement," Lynch said. "But the question is whether or not they're taking the core classes."

"Sometimes they miss a required course, generally the third math or third science class," he said.

In addition, Lynch said the percentage of minority students who take or finish the ACT is lower than that of majority students.

"They tend to not score as high on standardized tests, for whatever reason," he said. "It seems like the GPA will be the qualifier for a lot of our ethnic minorities."

To curb the situation, Lynch said, high schools have to get involved and educate students about the qualifications.

"Counselors have to make it clear to students what the requirements are," he said.

"You can only do so much, but you have to make sure the students know it, understand it and tell their parents," Lynch said.

Lynch also stressed the importance of educating them early.

"Because the classes build on each other, by the junior year it might be too late," he said. "Frankly, this has to start back in junior high."

Nancy Wilson, a counselor at Manhattan High School, said the core classes required by the regents are not much different from the college preparatory classes that were recommended before qualified admissions existed.

"We're really not offering anything different," she said. "We now require classes that were offered with college prep. This has just given us some strength behind our words."

She said Manhattan High was not doing anything specific to make minority students aware of the situation.

"I don't see kids of color as any different or requiring anything special," she said. "But I suppose it would depend on the student's background."

She said students who do not meet the requirements would probably not do as well at a regents university.

"It's not for everyone. A lot of students would be better off at a community college," she said. "This will make the decision for them."

Lynch said he agreed, and students not meeting the course requirements could be at a disadvantage.

"When they come to the university, they may have to back up and take classes that won't count toward graduation," he said.

"Or they would go into classes that assume they have already had those basic classes. It could be a really dismal situation."

Top 10 oversights in 1999 SGA platforms

- Top-10 things that didn't make anyone's platform for student body president in this year's Student Governing Association elections:
10. Filling Ahearn Field House with sand and building the world's largest sandbox.
 9. Filling Hale Library with books.
 8. Finding an even worse space for the proposed Alumni Center — like Lot B-2.
 7. Paying for library resources with Monopoly money printed with President Jon Wefald's picture in the center.
 6. All-campus laundry fee.
 5. Using student workers as part-time construction employees to save money and speed renovation of the K-State Student Union.
 4. Making Anderson Avenue more narrow and safer.
 3. Replacing flashing crosswalk lights on North Manhat' an Avenue with speakers that play the "Frogger" music.
 2. An apartment for the student body president above Wefald's garage.
 1. Support for a student privilege fee to fund tuition.

TODD PETERSEN/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The bitter reality of FRESHMAN PARKING

You don't realize how much you love something until you have had it sucked from your life.

FLETCHER

She wasn't much to look at, her get up and go had gone long ago, and the ceiling upholstery has been hanging for months. But she was still my car. You don't think you can miss an inanimate object, but you can. I remember our first wash, our first fill up with gas and even our first wreck (and my first insurance hike). From the moment I laid eyes on her (or rather the first moment I saw her price tag), I knew we were meant for each other because I couldn't afford anything else. It was a match made in heaven. She was my Silver. I was her Lone Ranger.

She hasn't gone away completely. Oh, no. She is still among us. There was no grand wreck or impounding in this tragedy. In fact, I still get to see her every couple of weeks. Those are on my periodic trips home or the days when I have to run an errand. But for the greater part of a week, she resides alone. Way out there in the last stall of Lot R. For those of you who don't know where Lot R is, I will borrow a line from Luke Skywalker. If there is a center of the universe, then R is the point farthest from it.

It all started in August. Just another wide-eyed first-semester freshman, I hadn't had my dreams shattered yet. Little did I know that on that fateful day, my life would be changed forever. That was that day that I received my parking pass. I stood in line in Kramer Dining center, awaiting a piece of paper that actually could change my life. My turn in line came up, and after giving my name and Social Security number, I received my envelope. Tearing into it, I retrieved the white parking permit that was emblazoned with the letter 'R.'

Not sure what that even meant, I casually asked the nice fellow wearing a K-State ballcap next to me if he knew what it meant if my permit said R.

Horror, shock and disgust crossed his face in seconds. He yelled out, "We got an R here." One girl shrieked and immediately fainted. "Lord have mercy upon this man's soul," cried out the curly-haired kid who was last in line. Amens were then quickly given, followed by a rash of Hail Marys. Suddenly I was the leper. The crowd scrambled away from me. "Don't get near the R." "Stay away from us, you R freak!" "If he touches you, we could catch it too." I ran away, very afraid.

Finding an upperclassman I could trust, I pulled him aside and quietly asked him about R. After taking the name of our Lord in vain several times, he was able to regain his composure. He asked me if I knew where the R parking lot was. "No," I replied. Again, the Lord's name. Quickly, he brought me to a campus map. Not finding it there, we continued to search. Finally, we found a satellite-imaging map of Riley County that showed miles in inches. I did a quick little calculation and estimated that even on the map, R parking lot was five feet away from my dorm home.

It couldn't be that far. I decided I would drive my car to its new home and find out just how far it really was.

An extensive search of the entire campus brought me to that barren landscape that is R parking lot. I was able to locate my parking spot, after a good 10 minutes of crying when I realized that I really was in the right place. Having no choice, it was time to hike back. About halfway, I wished I'd packed a lunch.

The next day, I stormed to the Pittman Building (walking, naturally), and demanded to know what was going on. My first taste of university bureaucracy. I explained my situation and asked what could be done. I knew my charm and logic would be irresistible. After her laughter stopped, she tried to explain to me between giggles that there was some sort of point system and that I didn't have enough points. She tried to explain how the system worked, but between the chuckles and the snickers, I soon realized it was hopeless.

I foolishly thought I could charm my way to that elusive GM spot. But to them, I was just a number and another face. As I left, I glanced back, and a window was open. There were about five women pointing and laughing at me on the other side of it. I guessed my story hadn't quite hit home like I thought it would.

An important lesson has been taught to me through all of this. College is all about freedom, and for me, it was hard to imagine that freedom without my car. Nothing says freedom to me like the windows rolled down, stereo blaring and the open road ahead of you. Through this adversity, I believe I have become a stronger person. There are ways around not having a car. Secondly, the people at Pittman can be mean.

Although, I miss the thrill of firing up my old Chevy, I have found a new hobby. Walking. It has become an almost religious experience. When you walk, you can get back in touch with nature. Driving, you don't get to enjoy the little things. The chirping of birds, the smell of the grass, the look on people's faces (man, don't I sound just like a Hallmark card).

Next time you are about to jump in your car and take off somewhere, think about if you need to. Could you walk? Sure it might take a little more effort and time but think about the exercise and that whole getting in touch with nature thing. Think about that if you are one of those people who are looking for a spot for their 8:30 at 8:35 a.m. I think about my getting in touch with nature when I am making the 15-minute trip to and from my car. That, and a lot of curses toward the Pittman Building.

Todd V. Stewart's review on 2 Live Crew's compilation album was a waste of time printing. His opinion of it doesn't speak for the other millions of people that like it. You've got to be from the dirty South to be able to understand the booty music scene.

Yeah, Manny Dies isn't the worst basketball player in the NCAA history — Tom Asbury is the worst coach in NCAA history.

I tell you what, I don't care if it's through tuition increase or privilege fee. You know, I'll pay the dollar. I'll pay two dollars, but I need books in my library.

Television isn't lowering anyone's I.Q. except R. A. Hartman's.

If "NYPD Blue" is realistic, just shoot me now.

If R. A. actually watched "The X-Files," he would know about it's intricate plot that forces viewers to think for themselves. It's fictional material that strives to entertain — not corrupt, period. If R. A. can't cross that mental hurdle, it's too bad for him and his readers.

I'm really glad Frank Murphy joined the K-State football program. Without him, we wouldn't have got to know all the wonderful NCAA officials so well. Thanks for nothing.

Privilege fee inappropriate funding source for library

Editor,

It is all because of one word. Privilege is just a nine-letter word, but it does make all the difference.

Privilege fees are used on this campus to provide services that are not critical parts of our education. The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, Lafene Health Center and the K-State Student Union renovations are all good examples of services that are not critical to education but provide added value to our campus experience.

Funding a crucial part of our education with a privilege fee is a line that has never been crossed. There are numerous areas across this campus that lack sufficient funds from the state. If privilege fees are used in this case we have to ask ourselves where it will stop. Once the students begin paying for essential services, what incentive will the Kansas Legislature have to increase its funding for K-State?

Some might believe our fears to be unfounded. However, when the resolution supporting a tuition increase earmarked for the library was introduced to Student Senate, it was suggested that faculty salaries also be included in the resolution.

This shows us that many people see library funding and faculty salaries as the same type of issue. We do not believe that privilege fees are the appropriate source of funding for either of these issues.

Recently, a column was written criticizing our attempts to find the appropriate funding source. We would like to clarify several points made in the column about the current proposal for library funding. If a tuition increase was earmarked specifically for the library we possibly could receive matching funds from the state. This fee could be controlled locally like the technology fee, which receives matching funds from the state government at a two-for-one ratio. The college council presidents compile a report on where they believe the technology money should be used. This report is submitted to the provost, who takes these recommendations into account when deciding where the money will be spent. That is the same level of control as we have over privilege fees. All Student Senate does is recommend the level at which privilege fees are to be set. It is a credit to our student government that our recommendations always have been followed by the administration; however, we would have as much control over a tuition increase specifically earmarked for the library as we do over privilege fees.

Another issue is the length of the payment. Once a privilege fee is created, that income stream is incorporated into that entity's budget. If a privilege fee was created for the library, in three years when it was reviewed by Student Senate, the argument would be made that the income from that privilege fee would be necessary for services to continue at the same level. If we institute a privilege fee, we would pay now and pay always, just as with a tuition increase. Theoretically, a privilege fee could end, but realistically, that would never happen.

We believe a tuition increase earmarked specifically for the library is a viable solution to the library funding problem. As stated in the column, a privilege fee would be an easy solution to the library issue because we could avoid the state's bureaucracy. The student's money is the easiest to get. Therefore, we must be cautious when looking at creating new fees and make sure that a privilege fee is the appropriate source of funds.

Stint in Germany proves value of communication skills

Sometimes I'll be listening to music in my room, and somehow I'll forget where I am. But as soon as I open my door and hear people conversing in another language, I am quickly reminded once more that home, for the time being, is Germany. There's plenty to be learned about oneself when you're stripped down to the essentials of your being (in my case, whatever clothes I could fit into a backpack and my guitar) and shipped over the ocean.

I came to Germany in August as part of a Mennonite program that places North American young adults in families and institutions in Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland. Somewhere along the way the goals of this program got lost on me, but I remember something about learning the language and learning to live and work with Europeans. It's less than easy for me to wonder what the hell I'm doing here, especially after the ninth day in a row of scraping grease and burnt chunks out of the deep fryer at the kitchen where I work. After having to look up five words in three sentences while writing a letter home, I sometimes can't help but think I've lost my English skills, thanks to German being my primary source of communication since the last summer.

A rosy picture can be painted of living in Europe for a year — sitting underneath breathtaking cathedrals while eating bread and cheese and drinking wine, all while taking a not-too-illegal doobie, leg hair flapping in the breeze (just like the brochure says!). That is not my reality, though somehow mine is turning out to be a good deal more interesting than just being able to drink legally, despite my age.

The initial challenges were silly things I never expected, like having to rehearse what to say in order to get stamps or having to deal with the general surliness of German customer service. Then there was the fielding of questions about my president and the fact that people here actually drink whole milk. Though I've overcome my fear of speaking German to folks in the public service sector, it's humbling to realize the mere lack of words could jolt me into sweat overdrive.

Having spent the first 20 years of my life in surroundings conducive to English speaking, I'd never really thought about words before. For me, as I suppose it is for most people in regard to their native tongue, whatever something was called in English, that was the correct word. In the kitchen where I worked for the first six months, the foreigners always outnumbered the actual Germans. Between us, we had Polish, Vietnamese, Russian and English as native languages, yet German was our common ground.

Words, and lack thereof, from home also have taken on a more intensified stance. A letter or e-mail can make or break my day depending on the words within. Never before in my life have I been so dependent on the communication skills of others. A precarious situation, to be sure, but one that has somehow lessened in its intensity during the months. Sometimes I end up feeling like I'm in that episode of "The Simpsons" where Bart and Lisa go to Kamp Krusty, except Krusty isn't going to show up here and take all the trainees and me to Tijuana.

Learning the language, though it has been the bane of my existence since day one, has also allowed me to get to know the best Europe has to offer — its people. Somehow I end up in conversations with little old ladies on the trams, conversations with guests where I work and naturally, conversations with my coworkers. I'd like to say my co-workers and I exchanged pieces of our own languages. The truth really is I ended up teaching Hai, the man from Vietnam, plenty of colorful words and expressions in English. Then Hai would say them to other co-workers who had no idea what he was saying. For giving him the gift of such valuable English, he taught me how to say, "Where's the bathroom?" in his language.

Language, language, language. Even as I write this column, I am struggling with my wretched English skills. I'm misspelling words left and right, and the spell check only checks German (and interprets some English words as misspelled German ones and corrects them on its own). Living in Europe is not about the leg hair, low drinking age, the Euro or relatively relaxed soft drug laws. Sure, those are the perks. But as an American (or Ami, as these lovable Krauts like to call us), the important thing is all that can be learned from our friendly neighbors across the ocean. I never would have thought of so many cream cheese combinations on my own. Nor would I have consumed so much tea if this year saw me at K-State.

Since I'm a mere 40 minutes from moving to my next placement, 700 kilometers south of where I have been since August, I quickly have to think of a witty ending — something to tie this damn thing up.

Germany — come for the beer, stay for the brats.

$2.4 million gift presented to scholarship drive

By JESSICA THOMAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The largest single gift to benefit student scholarships in the history of K-State was awarded to the KSU Foundation at a press conference Monday morning.

The gift of $2.4 million was donated by the late Florence Harold Marcoux, who received a master's degree from K-State in 1936.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, introduced representatives from the university and from the Marcoux Trust who were on hand to help present the check. He stressed the importance of general scholarships to assist students who want to receive a higher education at K-State.

"This scholarship will allow us to continue to attract and retain the kind of student that makes a difference at K-State," Bosco said. "It is very important that K-State have an adequate number of scholarships available to provide money to those kind of students."

The Harold Scholarship will be used for general scholarships to be awarded to incoming freshmen at K-State. It will emphasize leadership and community service as well as academic performance. In comparison, the Putnam Scholarships are four-year scholarships awarded to students with outstanding academic performance, said Bosco.

Florence Harold Marcoux was born in 1901 in a sod house south of Dresden, Kan. She was the ninth of ten children of Melissa and William Kline Harold. Marcoux received her bachelor of science degree in home economics education from K-State in 1930. She received her master's degree in dietetics and institutional management in 1936, also from K-State.

In her 97 years, Marcoux taught at every grade level from kindergarten through college. She met her husband Dale C. Marcoux while they were teaching at Washburn University. She was a home economics professor at Washburn for 15 years while her husband was a business professor there for 30 years. Florence Marcoux died June 10, 1998, in Oberlin, Kan.

With the Marcoux gift of $2.4 million, the scholarship campaign's current total is $35 million. The campaign's goal is to secure at least $50 million in private gifts and is set to continue through June 2000.

Marcoux had been working with her attorneys and the Foundation's planned giving staff before her death to create trusts to benefit the William and Melissa Harold Scholarship. The scholarship had been previously established by Marcoux to honor the memory of her parents.

Hurst Coffman, senior partner with Coffman, DeFries and Northern in Topeka, the firm that represents Marcoux's estate, spoke about her love of education and her dedication to students.

"Florence, to me, was one of the last of a dying breed of children of our Kansas pioneers," Coffman said. "She came from a relatively poor farm family and she believed that education was the single most important way for people to advance in their lives."

Coffman said many people ask him how Marcoux acquired the money she donated.

"Florence invested very shrewdly in the stock market and tried to never spend any money. Her and her husband were both educators throughout their lives," Coffman said. "She had a great love for the university and especially for the students."

Tracey Mann, student body president, expressed his gratitude for the donation from a student's point of view.

"I think you have to be a student to understand the importance of a gift like this to young people's lives throughout the state of Kansas," Mann said. "Before they even enter high school, many students and their families begin to wonder how they're going to pay for higher education. A gift like this enables students to realize a dream of attending an institution of the quality and caliber of K-State."

Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the Foundation, said more than 70 percent of K-State students need and qualify for financial aid.

"For more than 136 years, K-State has recognized creating opportunities for its students as its highest priority," Hellebust said. "The university's commitment to student opportunity is more critical than ever before and more at risk."

To reduce that risk, the Foundation is leading the university's $50 million scholarship campaign to increase the level of scholarships available to undergraduate and graduate students in all nine colleges and other selected university programs, Hellebust said. With the Marcoux gift of $2.4 million, the scholarship campaign's current total is $35 million. The campaign's goal is to secure at least $50 million in private gifts and is set to continue through June 2000.

"Florence believed in students," Hellebust said. "With planning and that belief, she made a tremendous contribution to ensure that opportunity for K-Staters."

Cats top Shockers, earn first home win

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team picked up a win against the Wichita State Shockers, who are 8-1 on the season, on the new courts at Ahearn Field House on Sunday.

"It was a solid win and a good performance," head coach Steve Bietau said.

The Cats moved to 2-6 for the spring and have one more match before they open the conference season.

Freshman Kathy Chuda and sophomore Anna Pampoulova both won their third consecutive matches. Chuda defeated Julie Perovic 6-2, 6-0, and Pampoulova beat Annelie van den Heever 6-2, 6-2.

Bietau said he was pleased with the Wildcats' winning performances.

"I don't know that there was one great performance, but there were several good ones," he said. "Anna and Kathy both played well."

In other matches, sophomore Martina Pospisilova won 6-4, 6-2 over Annette Hartman.

Sophomore Eva Novotna defeated Steph King 6-4, 6-3, while sophomore Natalia Farmer beat Kelli Clark 6-4, 6-1.

Freshman Vesselina Jeliasikova lost the only match of the day 6-2, 6-1 to Martina Stojkic.

Novotna, who has had eye problems, picked up her first win of the spring.

"Eva, who has been struggling lately, played better than she has been," Bietau said.

The Cats swept the Shockers in doubles play also as Pospisilova and Chuda won their second match as a doubles team, 8-5, over King and van den Heever.

Pampoulova and freshman Alena Jecminkova defeated Hartman and Clark, 8-5.

Farmer and Jeliasikova also got their second doubles win of the season, 8-5, over Perovic and Stojkic.

"The doubles play was inconsistent," Bietau said.

"However, the moments that were good were better than what we have seen so far," he said.

Bietau said he was glad to get Jecminkova back on the courts. She has missed the last few matches due to ankle problems.

"That was another plus in this match — just getting her back," he said. "We hope that she will be back in the singles lineup soon."

Bietau said he was glad his team was able to break in the new tennis courts at Ahearn.

"This is our first match in that facility on the new court surface," he said. "It is a great facility. It is one that we want to turn into a great home for us. We kicked the place off in the right way."

The tennis team will be back in action on the new courts Saturday against New Mexico.

Cats await Baylor after weekend wins

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team battled through blistering cold weather during the weekend to earn its fifth-straight victory while sweeping both Iowa and Air Force and boosting its record to 6-5.

The Cats played four contests in a three-day stretch, beginning with a double header with Iowa on Friday. Senior pitcher Derek Andersen (2-1) paced K-State from the mound, striking out a career-high eight batters while allowing only five hits and two runs in six innings as the Wildcats topped the Hawkeyes, 9-4.

"I thought we did a pretty good job throwing from the mound," head coach Mike Clark said. "I was real happy with how Derek pitched."

The Wildcats produced at the plate as well, pounding out seven hits while drawing a total of five walks from the Iowa hurlers. Freshman third baseman/pitcher Brett Reid smashed his first collegiate home run, a three-run blast in the third inning that propelled K-State to an insurmountable 4-0 lead.

The second match-up with Iowa proved more difficult than the first, but senior catcher Chet Savage came through in a crunch when he planted a home run outside the left field fence in the bottom of the 10th inning to seal the 5-4 victory.

K-State knocked the Hawkeye pitchers around for 15 hits, led by Savage and freshman shortstop Kyle Boyer, who both finished the night 3 for 4.

The Cats got off to an early start in the first inning when junior second baseman Chad Tabor hit a triple to lead off the second game of the double header. Reid later drove in Tabor on a ground-out to first base, which gave K-State a 1-0 lead.

Iowa responded by scoring four runs in the fourth, but K-State answered back with single tallies in the fifth, sixth and seventh innings to tie the game at four apiece before Savage ended the contest with his shot in the 10th.

Freshman pitcher Blake Johnson pitched the final 2.2 innings to pick up his first win of the season.

"We got to see us in two different situations today," Clark said. "One where we were ahead, and one where we had to claw and play solid baseball, and we couldn't make any mistakes."

The Wildcats scored early and often on Saturday, defeating Air Force 11-2 in a game that featured a season-high 16 hits from the K-State batsmen. Reid again led the Wildcat charge, collecting three hits and four RBIs. Four Cats finished the game with three hits: Tabor, K-State senior pitcher Brandon Peck throws a pitch during a baseball game at the Eisenhower Baseball Complex last week. The Cats are 6-5 for the season.

IVAN KOZARI/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State also excelled from the mound, with senior starting pitcher Brandon Peck (2-2) tossing five innings while striking out two and only allowing two runs on six hits.

The Cats closed the weekend riding on the arm of Reid, who struck out 12 Falcons in K-State's 9-1 win over Air Force on Sunday.

Reid pitched six strong innings, picking up his first win of the season while allowing only two hits and one run. He also notched two more RBIs, giving him a total of 11 during the course of the weekend.

"We signed him primarily as a position player," assistant coach Mike Hensley said. "This is just an added bonus."

"It's going to be hard to take him out of the rotation. Each time he's gone out there, he's pitched beyond his years," Hensley said.

Savage continued his impressive weekend at the plate, finishing the afternoon 2 for 4 while cracking his second home run of the season in the seventh inning to end the scoring at 9-1.

Senior closer/outfielder Andy Silva made his first appearance of the year after being involved in an automobile accident in the preseason. He pinch hit for Reid in the eighth inning and grounded out to third base.

"He's probably a week or two away from being ready. We don't want to rush him," Clark said.

The streak of five straight wins for K-State sets up a difficult series with the nationally ranked Baylor Bears on Feb. 26, 27 and 28.

Winning during the past weekend gives the Cats confidence as the Big 12 Conference season looms nearer.

"It was good to see our offense and defense working together," sophomore Michael Colosimo said. "It's a good feeling to be over .500, and hopefully we will keep it up going into Big 12 play."

"WE GOT TO SEE US IN TWO DIFFERENT SITUATIONS TODAY. ONE WHERE WE WERE AHEAD, AND ONE WHERE WE HAD TO CLAW AND PLAY SOLID BASEBALL, AND WE COULDN'T MAKE ANY MISTAKES."

Reid's 17 points spark Cats' overtime victory

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Josh Reid must have thought he was in Ames, Iowa, in the K-State men's basketball team's 64-58 overtime victory Saturday over Iowa State at Bramlage Coliseum.

Reid, a junior guard-forward, hit four second-half three-pointers in K-State's first game against Iowa State, Feb. 6 in Ames. Reid's spark helped K-State to a 67-62 triumph.

Saturday, Reid did it again against the Cyclones. This time, he hit three of five three-pointers and shot 60 percent from the field, getting 17 points and six rebounds in the Wildcats' victory.

"Obviously, Josh Reid really stepped up," head coach Tom Asbury said. "Down the stretch, he hit some really key shots for us. Actually, he was the difference in both games for us."

Included among Reid's 17 points were K-State's first seven points of overtime, including a three-pointer to start the extra period.

Although Reid might not have been the first option in overtime for the Wildcats, Asbury said Reid was wide open and took charge for K-State.

"We really wanted to give him some great looks," Asbury said. "In the first set, he was one of two options. We wanted him to hit a jumper or go to Manny (Dies) inside.

"In fact, he was probably our second option, but he had such a great look. No matter how good he is doing, Josh is never afraid to take a shot."

Senior forward Shawn Rhodes said Reid's three-pointer to start overtime was pivotal in the Wildcats' victory.

"I think it helps us a lot," he said. "When he gets going, he really helps this team out. And in overtime, whoever gets that first basket helps their team out a lot, especially when it's a three. You have to try and get on top first."

Reid said he felt positive about his performance, but didn't think he received a lot of good looks because of Iowa State's defense.

"I felt real good the whole game," he said. "I just didn't get a lot of shots off. But, when I did get that ball, I thought I was effective."

As for his overtime performance, Reid said he was excited to come up big in a close situation.

"That's the best part of the game," he said. "When it's close, I just want the help the team out the best I could, and I felt good all game."

With the Iowa State game being so close and emotional, Reid said he felt

As March Madness approaches, basketball fans find Jayhawks replaced by Longhorns

VIEWPOINT

CRANE

Less than two weeks remain in the college basketball season before the March Madness picture begins to be clear.

This is the first time since 1989 that Kansas hasn't been in the top 25. Texas is the only Big 12 Conference team ranked, at No. 22, in the AP polls.

There are many teams in the Big 12 that are on the bubble for the remaining bids in the NCAA tournament. Unfortunately, K-State isn't one of them. With a few more wins, they could have put themselves in contention for a spot.

Kansas is probably the only team that has a definite invite. Its strength of schedule is 17th, and it has improved after a couple of losses. The rest of the questionable teams will play out their fates this week (Oklahoma, Texas, Oklahoma State and Missouri).

Texas probably is going to wrap up the conference against Baylor on Wednesday, so it probably will be in as well. Many people are wondering what is wrong with the Big 12 this year. The answer is a lot of things.

A large part of the problem was upsets early in the season. Texas started out losing its first eight games before getting on a roll.

The reality of the situation is that instead of getting five bids, the Big 12 probably will get only four. Not a huge loss — it's just the sentence for earlier crimes committed.

Overall, Duke looks to be the favorite to win it all this year. Some of the other contenders include Auburn, Michigan St., Connecticut, Maryland and Stanford.

March Madness is the most exciting time in college basketball. Teams either have their dreams realized or crushed.

We'll have to wait until Selection Sunday to see what teams will or won't get that chance.

Because no one wants to read about all the other teams and not their own, I will apologize to K-State and move along down the sports highway.

It looks like our old buddy George Steinbrenner is at it again. Last week, he traded away his perfect-game throwing, obscenity shouting, beer-guzzling lefty David Wells and two other players for the coveted strikeout ace Roger Clemens.

Evidently, Steinbrenner really likes to win. The Yankees won a record 125 games last season en route to a world championship. Did Steinbrenner really need to deal away one of the Yankees most beloved players and risk screwing up team chemistry just to acquire another ace?

Wells was made into a sports media darling after he threw his perfect game on May 17, 1998, in Yankee Stadium. He was the anti-hero, the opposite of a professional athlete who was receiving accolades from all sides.

New York fans loved Wells' loud mouth and personality. He was coming off his best season ever at 18-4. Leave it to Steinbrenner to stir things up a bit.

I feel horrible for Wells. Here's a guy who loved playing for the Yankees. It was his childhood dream to play for them. He had his best season ever in the pinstripes. His idol is Babe Ruth. He just helped his team win a world championship.

Then, at spring training the following year, he is sent packing on the first day, back to Toronto.

Wells was made a cult hero in New York. His popularity couldn't have been higher. Now he's back where he began his career. The irony of the situation is the Yankees only signed Wells last season after it lost the bidding war for Clemens to Toronto.

Wells will be bringing with him a lot of emotional baggage to a team that has not shown much interest in being a contender. The owner of the Bluejays is not pursuing any of the high-profile free agents. The season looks dismal for the birds up North.

As for the Yankees, they've already ordered up the champagne and rings for next season.

The Cryptquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

L'DOPA BY DONALD J. LEE

THE GONGFARMERS BY RANDY REGIER

On the Wildside employee Andy Moeller, strings beads on a hemp necklace for a customer Sunday afternoon. The store has been in Aggieville for about nine years.

Taking a walk on the wild side

■ Store combines 1960s, 1990s with variety of merchandise.

Believe it or not, a virtual time capsule can be found in Aggieville.

A step into the novelty store On the Wildside might seem like a trip back to the 1960s. Tie-dyed tapestries hang from the ceiling, flower decal stickers adorn the window, the smell of incense wafts throughout the store and the sounds of the Grateful Dead blare from the speakers.

Romeo, the cat owned by shop owner Gary Bedenharn, is a fixture at On the Wildside.

The store, which opened in May 1990, sells everything from incense and candles to beaded curtains, hemp jewelry, Tarot cards and wall banners, Gary Bedenharn, owner, said.

Bedenharn also said the store has its origins thanks to the Grateful Dead. "This store was inspired by the Grateful Dead's 1990 comeback," he said.

On the Wildside is one of the older buildings in the area, Bedenharn said, and although the store looks unusual when compared to other buildings in Aggieville because of its design with paintings of the Grateful Dead bears on the outside walls, it was on Moro Street before many of the other buildings.

"Half of the buildings here were covered up when I got here, and now we're the ones that look out of place," he said. "But Aggieville is the perfect place for us because of the relaxed college atmosphere."

Incense and Bob Marley merchandise ranks among the biggest selling items in the store, Bedenharn said. Also widely popular are the articles of jewelry made of hemp that the employees make themselves.

"We have people pick out their own beads, and we make the style they want," said Andy Moeller, a sophomore in open-option and Wildside employee. "It takes about half an hour to make each piece of jewelry."

In the back of the building, is a room that contains subway posters featuring musicians, such as Jimi Hendrix and Janis Joplin, glued to the floor and covered in polyurethane. The room also has some novelty toys that come from the new Kidz World toy store, which opened in August, owned by Bedenharn's wife.

While it is not for sale, another popular attraction of On the Wildside is Bedenharn's cat, Romeo. The cat lives in the building and can be seen roaming the store.

"He's a big hit with the customers," Bedenharn said. On the Wildside was only a couple of doors down from Greek's Pizzeria, one of the establishments destroyed in last year's Aggieville fire.

Bedenharn said he remembered hearing about the fire when it occurred and thought of only one thing. "I was very worried about Romeo," he said. "I knew I just had to rush down here and get him."

The building suffered no smoke damage and minimal water damage, Bedenharn said, although the roof had to be replaced shortly afterwards.

A year later, business still is booming, he said, and the variety in his patrons keeps the work enjoyable.

"We get customers from 6 years old to 106. It's pretty cool," he said. "We also get mostly people who want music-themed merchandise or New Age products."

Moeller said that while he liked many aspects of working at On the Wildside, it was the customers who make the working environment enjoyable.

"I like the fact that you get to work with people," he said. "The customers are what keeps it interesting."

Bedenharn said while the '60s are long gone, On the Wildside would preserve the spirit of the decade for a long time to come.

"We'll probably be here for another 10 years or so," he said.

Country album gives fresh blend of humanity, humor

By KELLY LYNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

I was curious about country music artist Kenny Chesney's latest album, "Everywhere We Go," because I was only vaguely familiar with a few of his songs, like "Grandpa Told Me So," "She's Got It All" and "All I Need to Know."

The album is Chesney's fifth and, understandably, his best-selling album yet. His career began in 1993 with the release of "In My Wildest Dreams," and each release has been increasingly successful.

"Everywhere We Go" features mid-tempo country music, but his voice seems to give the music a more mellow tone. While his voice does not have the classic, country twang of George Strait, Chesney's style is strikingly country.

I enjoyed the fact that not all of the songs on the album deal with the themes of lost love and broken hearts that are too often associated with country music. Instead, this album offers a fresh combination of songs with a variety of themes.

My favorite track was entitled "The Baptism." The lyrics recall the feeling of being baptized in a river and, years later, wanting to have that feeling of comfort again. Chesney sings a duet with Randy Travis in this song, and I particularly enjoyed the imagery Travis and Chesney portrayed in the song: "I didn't see no angels, just a few saints on the shore/I felt like a newborn baby, cradled up in the arms of the Lord."

While a few of Chesney's songs dealt with serious issues such as religion and child abuse, the majority of his music is highlighted with overtones of change for the better and hope for the future.

There also is humor in some of the songs. For instance, one of Chesney's songs puts a fun spin on the album with "She Thinks My Tractor's Sexy."

Overall, Chesney's latest album offers a variety of easy-going songs with an upbeat twist on both lighthearted themes and more intense topics. With this in mind, "Everywhere We Go" definitely is a great album to listen to when trying to relax after a long day of classes.

Silverstone's acting, whining, pouting hinder success of 'Blast From The Past'

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

It's a scene most Baby Boomers will remember.

The movie "Blast From The Past" begins in 1962, when hostilities between the United States and Russia are mounting. There's a strong possibility of Russian missiles being launched, but a typical American family is ready for anything, thanks to its extremely large fallout shelter.

The couple, Calvin and Helen Webber (Christopher Walken and Sissy Spacek) are rushed one night into the shelter due to a false alarm. They mistake the sound of a plane crash for a nuclear weapon, and both know they are doomed to live underground for the next 35 years, until it is safe to go back up on the surface again.

Helen, who is pregnant, soon gives birth to a son, named Adam, and for the next 35 years, the Webbers live in a fallout shelter the size of a Sam's Club warehouse. Calvin Webber has ensured the shelter has all the conveniences of home: a kitchen, a television set, a classroom (for Adam's schooling) and even a simulated backyard, complete with astroturf.

After 35 years, Adam Webber (played by Brendan Fraser) is a grown man and eager to be introduced to the world above. He goes to the surface only to find a biker bar built where the Webber's house used to be, a society full of homeless persons, cross-dressing prostitutes and gang members.

The only ray of sunshine in this otherwise-dreary world is a young woman named Eve (ah, the irony), portrayed by Alicia Silverstone, to whom Adam is attracted immediately. With the help of Eve and her gay friend Troy, portrayed by Dave Foley, Adam is introduced to the 1990s. For someone who has literally lived in the 1960s all his life, this is quite the culture shock.

This movie is a dream come true for any members of the Baby Boomer generation who can't let go of their childhood.

The Webbers' fallout shelter is a virtual time capsule, a bit of 1960s Americana frozen in time. The lifestyle, clothing and mannerisms of the Webber family never change throughout the years.

Walken and Spacek make an unusual couple, to say the least. While Walken tries his best to portray a fatherly figure (despite his dark, almost spooky looks and demeanor), Spacek has done little acting of note since she had the title role in Stephen King's "Carrie" in the 1970s.

Silverstone, as always, manages to ruin an otherwise fun romp through time with her poor acting skills, whining and pouting. Luckily, Fraser's goofy antics almost make her look good. Once again, Silverstone is fortunate to have a superior co-star to complement her.

One of the more noticeable aspects to the movie is the way in which Adam is raised. It is interesting to note that Calvin taught his son French and Latin at age 8 but didn't explain the concept of sex to him until age 35.

Also, the thought of seeing no one but your parents for a large portion of your life would have to leave strong psychological effects. Perhaps, in the sequel, it would be more appropriate, and realistic, for Adam to undergo therapy.

Silverstone should do the same. Maybe then she could re-evaluate her future as an actress.

Witness testifies Byrd was alive during dragging

By MICHAEL GRACZYK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JASPER, Texas — Dragged along a bumpy road by a chain around his ankles, James Byrd Jr. desperately shifted from side to side to ease the excruciating pain and was alive until his head was torn off by a concrete drainage duct, a pathologist testified Monday.

Dr. Tommy Brown was the last of 43 prosecution witnesses to take the stand at the trial of John William King, one of the three white men accused of killing Byrd last June because he was black.

The defense also rested Monday, after presenting just three witnesses.

Prosecutors need to prove Byrd was alive when he was dragged in order to prove kidnapping and murder, which together would expose the white supremacist to the death penalty.

"It's my opinion, while being dragged, Mr. Byrd was conscious and was attempting to relieve the pain and injuries he was receiving," said Brown, who explained how Byrd's heels and limbs were ground to the bone.

"I think we all know how much brush-burn abrasions, like if you fall and slide on a surface with your hands — that's very painful — and this would have been very painful to him. He would probably swap one portion of his body for the other, trying to get relief as he was being dragged."

While the pathologist spoke, the jury of 11 whites and one black followed his descriptions with 14 crime-scene photographs delivered to them individually in black folders.

Prosecutors say Byrd was walking home from a party early last June 7 when he got a ride from the three white men and suffled with them. Brown said Byrd's fatal injury occurred about two miles into the grisly journey when his head, shoulder and right arm were torn off by a concrete drain pipe at the foot of a driveway.

The pathologist said there was no way to determine whether Byrd was still conscious when his head hit the culvert.

Hours later, the defense rested after calling three witnesses who testified for less than an hour. King did not take the stand.

The defense witnesses included a convicted burglar and sexual offender, John Mosley, who made some of the tattoos on King's body that prosecutors say are evidence of his seething racial hatred. Mosley said the tattoos "looked cool, that's all."

Another defense witness, Dennis Symmack, was called to show that King was a good employee and a hard worker. But Symmack, King's former supervisor for construction work, said he fired King after an argument and that King was well-educated about the Klan and didn't like blacks.

Before defense attorneys began their side of the case, the jury watched a silent 11-minute video authorities made the day after Byrd's body was found. The video retraced the nearly three-mile dragging route.

Also Monday, a Jasper County jail administrator, Mo Johnson, said authorities intercepted a letter written by King and intended to be smuggled to one of his alleged accomplices, Lawrence Brewer, in which he expressed pride in the crime and said he realizes he might have to die for it.

"Regardless of the outcome of this, we have made history," King said in the note, which he signed with a Ku Klux Klan symbol and Nazi salute.

problems.

"Two people notified me and were very interested," Moxley said. "The students' findings struck a note that was consistent with their research."

Tom Roberts, assistant dean of engineering of student services, and Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, will attend the class Thursday to address the students and their findings.

"Newton felt this information wasn't surprising," Moxley said. "He reported that these were consistent findings."

Roberts has done research on the attitudes, perceptions and expectations students bring with them to college. Newton has done descriptive research in the past of what is on students' minds and what is stressful to them. After reading the class' findings, Roberts and Newton said the results correlated with their own research.

"I want to do some more listening," Roberts said. "I want to learn more about why students feel connected or disconnected."

Bosco said he had been also invited to the class on Thursday and would try to attend. He said he was anxious to hear students' specific comments.

"I visited with the instructor and I'm still not clear about what the specific complaints were," he said. "I'm very anxious to respond to where we may be coming up short."

Roberts said the first step is to understand the concerns and issues of the students and why they have them. The next step is to see what can be done.

"I'm interested in what we can do to enhance the student-faculty relationship," Roberts said.

Newton said he will join Roberts Thursday mainly for discussion purposes and to see if his past observations are similar to those the students found.

"I want to hear from them about what their thoughts are," Newton said. "Their findings are real congruent with my topic of study."

Roberts said he would like to see an increase in discussion about the issue.

"I'm hoping my research with students' attitudes, perceptions and expectations about college will stimulate discussion," Roberts said.

Moxley said she wants to see whether additional studies would support the project results. K-State should do some things differently than it is now if the results hold true, she said. A follow-up survey would include new questions from Roberts' and Newton's data.

"I think we should be concerned if this truly is a widespread phenomena," Moxley said.

Travis D. Lenkner contributed to this story.

AUDIT

the rest of the fiscal year.

Tracey Mann, student body president, said he is glad the audit is completed, and although the station has had problems in the past, he said he hopes it can fix them and move forward.

"The things the station has done this semester are positive," Mann said. "These things happened in the past, and I think the senate and everyone else realizes that."

Sunday night, the Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee voted to send KSDB's request for emergency funds and the regular privilege fee request to Senate on Thursday. The proposal for the emergency fee will cover the debt from Springfest '98. Normally, the privilege fee for KSDB lasts for three years, but because of the emergency situation, the regular privilege fee now will come up for review every year. This year's request includes a supplemental one-year increase that will be used for the station manager's salary and other station operation expenses.

"If I were on Senate, I would want to see how the station was running after a year," Simon said. "It is almost better that this came up now than in the middle of a fee cycle."

Simon said the deficit is a separate issue for the future of the station. He also said past problems of the station are not the responsibility of the current staff.

"We need to have operating money regardless of what this audit says and regardless of what happens with this deficit," Simon said. "It also shouldn't overshadow what is going on at the station."

Clayes said the station is working with a small budget, relying heavily on underwriting.

Underwriting is similar to public television where a business can sponsor a segment but cannot compare products with another business.

"It all starts with our underwriting director, Wes Ashton. He has tripled the amount of underwriting in five weeks, compared to what we have done in the past four semesters," Clayes said.

Clayes said the station is looking into fund-raising opportunities with alumni but with a limited volunteer staff, it is not feasible now.

"The staff is focusing on their jobs, but we are looking into possibilities for the long-term operation of the station," he said.

According to new Federal Communication Commission guidelines, all radio stations have to go digital by 2007. Clayes said he would like the station to go digital as soon as possible, since it is required regardless of the whether the station has money.

"We have come so far in the past five weeks," Clayes said. "The students here now had little or nothing to do with the expenses incurred."

KOSOVO

Milan Milutinovic, but without making any apparent headway in breaking down Serb resistance to the use of NATO peacekeepers to enforce a settlement.

French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine also met with the Serbian president.

All sides are working against a deadline of 3 p.m. (9 a.m. EST) Tuesday.

Negotiators for the ethnic Albanians, who make up 90 percent of Kosovo's population, were holding out for a referendum at the end of the three years that could pull them out of Serbia, while the Kosovo Liberation Army was bargaining for a future role in Kosovo.

The peace plan calls for autonomy but not self-rule for the ethnic Albanians.

In Tirana, Albania, Prime Minister Pandeli Majko said any Kosovo peace deal must allow ethnic Albanians to express their free will for independence. He said the Albanian government would stand by any decision they make.

The Serbs have refused to accede to U.S. demands that a 28,000-member NATO peacekeeping force, including up to 4,000 Americans, be part of any peace agreement. Germany pledged 5,500 troops to such a force Monday.

"There is nothing new," Milutinovic said. "We are in the same position."

"We are for the political agreement. After that, we can discuss implementation."

In Yugoslavia, about 10 Serb military vehicles came under fire near Vucitrn, said Walter Ebenberger, a spokesman for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. He said the Serbs called in reinforcements — including two tanks and an armored personnel carrier — that returned fire.

The Kosovo Information Center, run by the ethnic Albanians, said the fighting began when government troops attacked three villages.

"It is hard to be optimistic," Albright's spokesman James P. Rubin said earlier Monday. "We are working as hard as we can."

Michelle Hiss, freshmen in business, said she enjoyed the Telefund and would be participating again next year.

"I thought Telefund was great. I won lots of prizes," Hiss said. "It was easy, and there was great competition among everyone."

Hiss was volunteering at the Telefund when the College of Business Administration met its goal. She said it was the highlight of the evening.

"It was great being able to accomplish what we set out to do," Hiss said.

for community colleges.

That plan, in bill form, remains in the House Education Committee, but Tanner, R-Baldwin City, said it would be jettisoned in favor of something similar to the new Senate plan.

"They would hope to be fairly close together," Tanner said of the Senate and House versions emerging. "With just six weeks left in the (regular) session, we have to come up with a bill that's very similar to the Senate bill. Otherwise, we will create a disaster of our own making."

Tanner said informal discussions involving Graves, Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer and Senate and House leaders in recent weeks led to the development of the plan being advanced in general terms in both houses.

Tanner said he told Graves last week "this task force report doesn't have legs," and the governor did not quarrel with him.

Emert and Downey said community college interests are amiable to the new plan, but it hasn't been run past the regents or the Board of Education.

The bill would abolish the present nine-member Board of Regents and replace it with a new board, also made up of nine members. However, three of those members would have supervisory power over the state's six universities and their branches, three would run the community colleges and vo-tech schools, and three would constitute a Board for Higher Education Coordination to focus on coordination matters.

All nine members would sit as a board of regents to make decisions on proposals developed by the three subgroups.

The plan does not require a constitutional amendment to make it work, but Emert and Downey said they would like to see one submitted to voters to permit the enlargement of the new board to 15, so there would be five members on each subgroup instead of three.

he game reminded him of the Wildcats' 34-80 overtime victory Nov. 24 over Arizona State in the Maui Invitational.

In that game, Reid scored 23 points, including five three-pointers.

"During the game, I was kind of thinking back to the Arizona State game," he said. "That was an emotional game also."

Rhodes said Reid's performance is exactly what the Wildcats needed in order to be successful.

"He was on tonight," he said. "He hit some big shots in the clutch for us. He stepped up for us, and we needed that. He made a lot of our baskets in overtime, and we need some guys to step up like this."

Kansas Highway Patrol Drug and Alcohol Evaluation Unit uses volunteers to train local police for intoxication testing

Officers from the Riley County Police Department and surrounding counties and towns participated in a training session Tuesday in which seven volunteers were provided with alcohol to allow police officers to administer DUI tests.

The session, which was presented by the Kansas Highway Patrol Drug and Alcohol Evaluation Unit, began Tuesday and continues through Thursday.

This is the second session that has taken place in Riley County. The first took place in May 1998. Twenty-two officers from seven different departments, including three officers from K-State Police, attended the session on Tuesday.

Seven volunteers were recruited to consume alcohol. Lt. John Doehling, RCPD training officer, said having intoxicated subjects to administer tests to is more beneficial than testing people who are sober.

"We allow some time for the alcohol to build up in their system and then subject them to standardized field sobriety tests," Doehling said.

The volunteers, who ranged in ages from 22 to 55, were monitored and checked periodically by officers while they drank. The volunteers were of three women and four men of different body types. Most of the volunteers drank beer, but some had mixed drinks.

The subjects were placed in a room with access to snacks and alcohol paid for by the RCPD.

After the subjects had been drinking for 2-1/2 hours, they were given a breathalyzer test by the Highway Patrol officers to determine their blood-alcohol content. The officers attending the training session then broke into groups to administer three tests to each volunteer. The officers determined whether they would arrest subjects based on their performance on the tests. These officers were not made aware of the results of the volunteers' blood-alcohol content until they had administered tests to each subject.

Sgt. Jeff Collier of the highway patrol was one of the four officers leading the training session. He said each of the trainers is a drug-recognition expert that has been nationally certified. The DAE unit travels all over the state to conduct similar training sessions.

Among other things, the DAE unit also has check-lane schools to teach officers how to set up sobriety check points, and it travels to teach school counselors and nurses how to check students for drug use. When the unit has spare time it assists with check points, but it has kept busy, Collier said.

Doehling said that although every officer on the street has knowledge about DUI detection and apprehension, it is important to bring in the DAE unit to provide more in-depth training on the scientifically validated field tests.

"They have the expertise in this area," Doehling said. "That's why they can go out and train other people."

The three tests administered are the horizontal-gaze test, the walk-and-turn test and the one-leg-stand test. During the horizontal-gaze test, the subjects are asked to follow the movement of a pen with their eyes. The officers look at the subjects' eyes for the involuntary jerky movements made when a person is intoxicated.

The walk-and-turn test requires the subject to walk toe to heel on a straight line for 9 feet, turn and walk back the same way. For the last test, the subject must stand on one leg with the foot held about six inches off the ground in front of the other foot. The subject must hold that position for 30 seconds, while counting aloud and keeping their eyes on their foot.

The last two tests are called divided attention tests. David Corp of the highway patrol said they require the same skills needed to operate a motor vehicle, which include coordination, short-term memory, balance, and small muscle control.

Nate Maholland, senior in social science, was a volunteer drinker for the training session. He said the experience was informational as well as fun.

"I had to miss two classes to come here, but this has probably been more educational than those classes would have been," Maholland said. "I was surprised because I didn't realize how intoxicated I was. I felt like I could have driven, but I was actually over the legal limit."

Jury convicts Jasper killer

By TERRI LANGFORD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JASPER, Texas — A white supremacist was convicted of murder Tuesday and could get the death penalty for chaining a black man to a pickup truck and dragging him until his body was torn to pieces in a crime that shocked the nation with its savagery.

The jury of 11 white people and one black person took less than 2-1/2 hours to reach a verdict against John William King in the slaying last June of James Byrd Jr. Courtroom spectators applauded, and the victim's relatives broke into tears.

The jury then began hearing evidence on whether the 24-year-old laborer should get the death penalty or life in prison for one of the grisliest racial crimes in the United States since the civil rights era.

"I am relieved," Stella Brumley, Byrd's sister, said. "That's all we wanted, was justice."

His son, Ross Byrd, said, "All I know is that there's one down and two to go."

King was the first of three white men to go on trial in the slaying, which prosecutors said he carried out because he wanted "something dramatic" to gain credibility for a racist group he was organizing.

King leaned forward when the verdict was read, shielding himself from cameras, then sat back in his chair with his fingers on his chin.

One of his lawyers said King was not surprised by the verdict and considered himself the victim of a conspiracy.

"I hope he receives life without parole," the Rev. Jesse Jackson said from New York. "If these three men saw killing as a solution in their sick state, then we in our sober and sane state must know killing is not a solution."

NAACP President Kweisi Mfume said the case "clearly shouts across the world for the urgent need of this Congress to move quickly to strengthen and to pass anti-hate legislation."

Byrd's head and arm were found torn off after he was pulled nearly three miles while tied by his ankles with a 24-1/2-foot chain.

The murder thrust Jasper, Texas, into a national spotlight that many towns of 8,000 said was unfair. Members of the Ku Klux Klan and New Black Panthers descended on Jasper, about 100 miles north-east of Houston, to demonstrate.

"Three robbed riders coming straight out of hell — that's exactly what there was that night," prosecutor Pat Hardy said Tuesday.

"After they dragged that poor man and tore his body to pieces, they dropped it right in front of a church and a cemetery, to show their defiance to God, to show their defiance of Christianity and everything most people in this county stand for."

The evidence against King included a lighter engraved with a Klan symbol and King's prison name that was found along with cigarette butts at the scene; clothes stained with Byrd's blood; letters in which King wrote about organizing a racist gang; and King's tattoos of a black man hanging from a tree, cartoon characters in Klan garb, Nazi-type SS lightning bolts and Aryan power proclamations.

Web site to outline degree requirements

By MOLLY MERSMANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some of the construction at K-State goes unseen by the students. Since the K-State home page began offering K-State Access Technology System for students to check grades and semester schedules, one site has been under construction and inaccessible.

Susan Woodard, assistant to the registrar, has been working with the dean's offices and computer specialists to get the Degree Audit Reporting System within the KATS site operable.

"Basically, what it is is a program that will take the students' courses that they've taken at K-State and transfer courses and display a listing of requirements they've met," Woodard said.

She said the feature also would allow students wanting to change majors to see which courses would transfer to a different degree program.

"We've never had anything that showed a student how transfer courses will work in their degree program," she said. "I think it will be really helpful."

More than students will be aided by the new feature, Woodard said.

"We also see this as a way to help advisers," she said. "It gives them time to spend more time helping the student."

Diane Barker, transcript specialist for the College of Arts and Sciences, has been working with Woodard to make the features offered on the site helpful to students and their advisers.

"If you were thinking of switching majors, you could push a button, and it would show you what you need. Right now, everyone does it by hand," Barker said. "It benefits students, faculty, advisers and the whole campus."

Barker said DARS will eliminate paperwork and allow students to find answers to questions about transfer courses without having to wait for advisers to complete forms and look up information.

"It will be very helpful to the students," she said. "They can shop for a degree."

Serbians resist negotiations for Albanian self-rule; additional peace talks arranged for March

By BARRY SCHWEID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMBOUILLET, France — Serbs agreed in principle Tuesday to give limited self-rule to majority ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, but the two sides failed after 17 days of intense negotiations to conclude a deal for ending their year-long conflict. More talks were scheduled for March as a new round of violence shook the province.

The partial settlement puts on hold, at least temporarily, NATO's threats to bomb Serb targets if they don't adopt the complex plan that would force them to withdraw troops from Kosovo and accept NATO peacekeepers.

After four days of strenuous personal diplomacy, shuttling between the two sides and even enlisting the help of 1996 GOP presidential candidate Bob Dole, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright accepted less than she had insisted on.

There was no provision for deploying NATO peacekeepers in the tense province to enforce the settlement, and the Serbs refused to give their consent to main elements of the self-rule sought by the ethnic Albanians.

Senior U.S. officials said, the Serbs still insist on Serbian courts for Serbs accused of crimes, refuse to permit the ethnic Albanians to have a president and are unwilling to cooperate with a war crimes tribunal looking into atrocities against civilians committed during the war which has claimed some 2,000 lives.

"But we have broken the stalemate that hung over Kosovo for so long," Albright said.

The Albanians also hedged. They were given two weeks for consultations with people in the province and still are insisting on a referendum to vote for independence and secession from Serbia at the end of the three-year autonomy trial period envisioned by the accord formulated by the United States, Britain, France, Italy, Germany and Russia.

The settlement also calls for a restoration of the cease-fire that was arranged by U.S. envoy Richard Holbrooke last October and for the staged removal of Serbian troops and special police units — but only after a NATO force is deployed to enforce the agreement.

In order to put a halt to the protracted negotiations, which ran through two deadlines, the ethnic Albanians and Serbs agreed to another round of talks in France, beginning March 15.

"We have done a lot here even if we have not done enough," said British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook, who led the talks along with Proposed legislation would ban samples of tobacco

TOPEKA — Passing out free samples of cigarettes and other tobacco at fairs, rodeos and other events would be outlawed in Kansas under a bill considered Tuesday by a Senate committee. Tobacco industry lobbyists told the Federal and State Affairs Committee state law already prohibits passing out samples to anyone under 18, and an outright ban would interfere with marketing to adults.

Sen. Donald Biggs, D-Leavenworth, told the committee, which took no action on the bill, "It's totally inconsistent to have a public policy permitting free samples of tobacco products."

Also urging passage was Jerry Scott, a former Salina fire marshal and member of Tobacco Free Kansas Coalition. During his testimony, he put a plastic bag filled with dozens of smokeless tobacco cans on the committee table, saying they were free samples given to free stations.

"Distributors try to increase sales through providing free samples, and nothing currently prevents this," Scott said.

Speaking against the bill was Witney Damron, Smokeless Tobacco Council lobbyist.

"If this legislation is intended to prevent underage kids from using or gaining access to tobacco products, then it is misguided. Smokeless tobacco products are not sampled to minors, period," Damron said.

Also opposed to the bill was Ron Hein, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company lobbyist, who said, "It appears that all it would do would be to interfere with brand competition with existing adult smokers."

Biggs told the committee that if it didn't want to endorse the bill banning samples, then it should consider two other measures. One would require those handing out tobacco samples at public events to give four weeks notice to the Department of Revenue. The other would require that a tax be paid on smokeless tobacco samples as is done on cigarette samples.

NBC will air interview with Clinton's assault accuser

NEW YORK — NBC said it will broadcast its interview with Juanita Broadrick, an Arkansas woman who claims she was sexually assaulted by Bill Clinton 20 years ago, tonight on "Dateline NBC."

NBC's Lisa Myers interviewed Broadrick in January. While the network continued to check her allegations, The Wall Street Journal editorial page ran a piece Friday based on Broadrick's charges and other news media organizations followed suit.

NBC News President Andrew Lack said the network wanted to complete its reporting on the story before airing it and wasn't angry that others had beaten NBC.

President Clinton's lawyers said Broadrick's allegations were "absolutely false."

Broadrick said she first met Clinton in 1978 when he was running for governor and she was a campaign worker. A week after meeting him, she was in Little Rock, Ark., at a seminar and arranged to meet Clinton, then Arkansas' attorney general, for coffee at her hotel.

She said they went to a hotel room, where Clinton forced her to have sex. "I was sexually assaulted by Bill Clinton," she has told The Associated Press.

The timing of the broadcast had nothing to do with the end of Clinton's impeachment trial, Lack said.

"When you have a story that was 21 years ago, that involves lots of information and facts and involves serious charges, you need to do a lot of checking," he said. "And that's what we were doing."

Broadrick said she was telling her story to counter rumors that she had been bribed and intimidated to stay quiet. She said NBC had let her "hang out to dry" by waiting to air the interview.

The interview airs at 7 tonight.

U.S. fighters bomb 2 sites in northern Iraqi no-fly zone

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two U.S. F-15 fighters each dropped a 2,000-pound bomb on a military command and control installation in Iraq Tuesday after planes patrolling the northern no-fly zone came under anti-aircraft fire, Pentagon officials said.

Army Col. Richard Bridges said in a separate incident, an unknown number of F-15s dropped 500-pound bombs on a multiple-launch rocket site used as an air defense facility.

Both incidents, near the city of Mosul, about 250 miles north of Baghdad, occurred at about 6 a.m. EST, Bridges said.

He said there was no immediate word on the extent of damage caused by the bombing and that the U.S. aircraft were not damaged.

The official Iraqi News Agency, quoting an unnamed military spokesperson, reported nothing about structural damage from the attacks but said one Iraqi civilian was injured. It said the planes entered Iraq from Turkey in 13 waves and were aided by an Air Force AWACS airborne command and control aircraft.

"Our ground defenses engaged these planes and forced them to flee," the news agency report said.

Iraqi forces repeatedly have challenged allied planes enforcing no-fly zones in northern and southern Iraq since U.S. and British airstrikes on Iraq in December. In recent weeks U.S. and British planes have responded by attacking a variety of air defense targets almost daily.

The flight-exclusion zones were set up after the 1990-1991 Gulf War to protect Iraq's Kurdish and Shiite minorities.

Weather curtailed U.S. and British patrol flights over the southern no-fly zone Tuesday, officials said.

Roberts says Clinton should report military activity

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With the possibility of a new military deployment to Kosovo growing, Sen. Pat Roberts said Tuesday that President Clinton is ignoring a law requiring him to report to Congress.

The National Security Council told Roberts, R-Kan., such a report would be forthcoming, but he said "it should have come much more quickly." Clinton has pledged up to 4,000 American troops if a peace accord could be reached.

Language placed by Roberts in the fiscal 1999 defense spending bill directed the president to outline to Congress U.S. national security policy in the region, including how it should be funded and what his exit strategy is.

Without such a report and barring an emergency, the provision prohibits defense funds from being spent on a deployment.

"This is the law of the land, and the National Security Council is aware of this," Roberts said on the Senate floor, waving a copy of his language as he spoke and slapping the paper to make his point.

"This requires the administration to come to Congress and report."

On the eve of a meeting Tuesday at the White House, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott sent Clinton a letter saying he was worried that U.S. forces "could become involved in yet another costly, open-ended and ill-defined peacekeeping mission" in Kosovo.

Asked about Lott's reservations, Clinton said, "What we learned in Bosnia was that we shouldn't set a date certain (for withdrawal) and later find out we can't meet it."

House to vote today on new highway plan

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House made only small changes in a no-bonds, no-tax-increase transportation plan drafted by Republican leaders, then tentatively approved it Tuesday night.

Representatives are scheduled to take a final vote today on the bill. It would raise $2.1 billion in new revenues over eight years to help finance highway improvements and aid to rural airports, public bus systems and short-line railroads.

Passage would send the bill to the Senate.

The House advanced the bill on a voice vote, so leaders had no good indication of whether it would pass on final action. However, an attempt to send the bill back to committee failed 49-71.

Supporters of the plan said it would result in a significant transportation program without increasing taxes or requiring the state to issue bonds. They described it as the most responsible alternative.

Critics said it would take money away from public schools and government programs. They circulated stickers that said, "Let the Senate fix it," saying that was the attitude of supporters.

"We don't care about a responsible program," Rep. Rocky Nichols, D-Topeka, said. "We just want to get something out of the House because we're so out of control that we can't pass a responsible plan."

Supporters said they expect the state to have enough money for the plan from collections of existing taxes that grow with the economy. However, legislators would have to forget about cutting taxes for at least several years.

Some advocates of a new transportation program said the state should increase vehicle registration fees and gasoline and diesel fuels taxes. Gov. Bill Graves proposed issuing $2.1 billion in bonds.

The House GOP plan is $300 million smaller than Graves' plan.

"Is there room for improvements?" Transportation Secretary Dean Carlson asked of the House GOP plan. "Yes, but this will work."

The only adjustment in the House Republican leaders' plan came when representatives approved, 64-57, an amendment from Rep. Margaret Long, D-Kansas City.

It added $40 million over eight years in aid for public transit systems, taking the money from large road and bridge repairs.

Two amendments to whittle the plan down, from Reps. Tony Powell, R-Wichita, and Peggy Palmer, R-Augusta, failed.

Powell's amendment, to trim the new revenues dedicated to the program to $1.5 billion, failed on a 50-73 vote. Palmer's amendment, to raise $1.6 billion in new money, failed, 56-66.

Proposals to increase the size of the program in the bill failed by even larger margins.

Rep. Ed McKechnie, D-Pittsburg, proposed a plan requiring $2.7 billion in new revenues over eight years and lost his amendment on a voice vote. Rep. John Edmonds, R-Great Bend, proposed raising $3.3 billion in new revenue, but his amendment was rejected, 15-99.

Despite polls, House rebukes Graves' idea

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Bill Graves won last year's governor's race with the highest percentage margin of victory in state history.

You might not know it from the way the House treated his transportation program Tuesday.

It's not that House members criticized his plan, which would require the state to issue $2.1 billion in bonds to help pay for transportation improvements. They have been doing that for weeks.

It also wasn't that House members thought it valuable to send Graves a message by taking time to vote on his plan, in the form of an amendment offered by conservative Rep. Carlos Mayans, R-Wichita, a Graves critic.

It was the vote itself: a stunning 0-125. A unanimous rejection of anything in the Legislature is highly unusual.

House members hooted in approval when the tally on Graves' transportation plan flashed on their voting boards. However, if the vote was meant to be a stinging rebuke, it didn't appear to sting much.

"We're not going to play the game of 'gotcha' and are happy to work with legislators who want to move forward on transportation," Mike Matson, Graves' spokesperson, said.

K-State president Jon Wefald gets rid of his coat and hides his dark purple tie carefully in his shirt.

He prepares for the final ping-pong game in Derby Food Center.

The Moore Academic Council had asked Wefald to play against the Moore Hall tournament champion. About 50 students attended the final match.

"We wanted to do something out of line," said Regina Tirella, graduate student in student counseling/personal services and adviser of MAC. "We had not expected that he would say yes."

Wefald surprised his opponent with several smashes. He preferred the traditional European grasp, whereas Dmitry Golub, graduate student in mathematics, favored the Chinese style. Last week, Golub placed second behind Aaron Schroeder, junior in computer science, in the Moore Hall tournament. Schroeder didn't want to skip class, so Golub took his place.

"The champion had an important class today," Golub said. "So I took on the job to represent Moore Hall."

Golub said he had an advantage in the game because he was dressed casually.

On the other side of the table, Wefald fought with the slippery floor in his elegant shoes.

Golub started the game anxiously, which helped Wefald get out to an early lead, 2-0. Both players put up a tight match, with often one point separating the opponents. However, at the end of the game Golub was able to break away from Wefald, winning 21-17.

"It was a close game," Golub said.

"I was nervous at the beginning."

Nevertheless, Wefald's ambition emerged as he asked for his next opponent. He won his next game 21-11.

After the match, Wefald had lunch with 14 students at Derby.

"It is the first time I had ever met President Wefald," said Lisa Abfalter, freshman in pre-professional education and member of MAC. "I think we accomplished the goal that Wefald is really somebody to talk to."

Audit should prompt further investigation

Point your World Wide Web browser to collegian.ksu.edu/ksdb.audit.html. Read the content. Get angry.

What's revealed in the audit report of KSDB-FM 91.9 is the gross misuse of student funds. The report outlines mistakes such as Springfest '98, phone usage, vehicle leasing and poor inventory. It specifically explains how the campus radio station lost $74,000, including $35,000 in student fee funds.

The audit's purpose was to inform the Privilege Fee Committee about the dire status of Wildcat 91.9. The committee quickly wrote legislation to request emergency funds for the station.

But the audit also should be grounds for further investigation. Money was either lost through extreme incompetence or deliberate misappropriation of funds. Whether or not the losses end up warranting criminal investigation, $74,000 is too much money just to say "oops" and move on.

Don't think students are done paying for the mistakes, either. The station's request for emergency funds to cover losses from Springfest most likely will be passed by Student Senate on Thursday. After all, not to pass such legislation would mean the station would continue to operate in debt and possibly be shut down.

The outcome of the situation should be to discover exactly why it happened, who did it and how to make sure it never happens again.

The station's adviser and licensee will undoubtedly need to have a stronger role at the station. Someone will have to call the station manager on the carpet and make sure that indeed, the station is being managed.

However, student senators, who will be debating the emergency funding request on Thursday, should not look at the poor financial supervision as reason to become acting administrators of the radio station. Senate has reason to be curious and cautious when fees come up, but they never should become managers of fees that already have been approved.

Another possible recourse would be to strengthen the voice of the KSDB Advisory Board, a committee of students and faculty that in its present state acts only as a focus group without any real power. Without creating a board of directors, the station should look to this committee for programming and financial concerns.

Because, if anything, the lesson to be learned from this debacle should be that another set of eyes could have averted several huge mistakes.

David Levin's column was so true about giving, and I really appreciate it. The greatest gift is laying our lives and time down to help others, and that's what God did when he sent us Jesus.

Yeah, I'm currently watching the K-State/Iowa State game, and I would just like to comment on how I think Chris Griffin is the worst Division I basketball player I've ever seen.

Went to the library yesterday and found two of 11 journals I needed for a paper I'm writing. So I see we bought Veryl Switzer a Caddy. Great, isn't it?

Where are all the interesting people? Out of the thousands on this campus, how come there isn't any?

We have a good coach, assistants and team. Let's honor the seniors, fill Bramlage Wednesday night and trash the Huskers.

This is in response to Monday's Collegian article by Jina Hippe. Gosh, 13 students — boy, that's a pretty good, very accurate indication of how many people really are dissatisfied. I think I'm dissatisfied, too.

You should know, as journalists, that 13 students surveyed isn't a very good representation of the entire student body. You printed this on the front page. The story isn't written very well. You also chose to print it on a day when quite a few high school seniors and their parents will be here. Of all the days to print it, this was a bad one.

I'd like to know if high school students, conference participants and all other random visitors to K-State paid $60 for a parking pass. I hope they're enjoying the ones.

FEMINISTS

No More Burning Bras

Feminism's accomplishments are best when they're accepted as the norm

Will all the bra-burning feminists, chauvinistic men and my mother please put down this paper and walk away? Trust me, you want to.

There's been a book making the rounds lately by Danielle Crittenden called "What Our Mothers Didn't Tell Us" that is a look at where feminism is today and how women of my generation are handling all of the hard-won freedoms.

According to this book, it's not good. Apparently we don't fully appreciate what we have, not through any fault of our own but because feminism and its benefits surround everything we do. Sort of like oxygen. When it's always there you just don't notice.

What I have noticed from my own white-girl, mainstream existence is that feminism's greatest accomplishment seems to be confusing men. Not that I blame them; I'm confused and I'm supposed to be part of this "movement."

(If there is some sort of handbook for the modern feminist, could someone please pass me a copy before I hit the real world?)

I've asked around, and a lot of the things that we modern-day feminists are supposed to get worked up about don't really seem all that important in the big picture. Except for the wage gap; that really burns me. But I'll save that rant for another column.

Most women I talked to said they felt pretty confident they would be able to raise children and hold down good jobs. No one said they felt they were only going to college to catch husbands. I don't appreciate my right to vote as much as I probably should; it's always been there and no one has tried to take it away.

It was the little things that stuck in our craws. For example: doors. Do we open them, do guys open them? Do we get huffy when they open them for us? Should we be upset when they don't?

Who pays? This still remains the big mystery. I always figured whoever asks pays, but going dutch is supposed to be more politically correct. To be honest, I am a poor college student who will grab a free meal whenever I can. If being a girl means I don't have to buy it, great.

If we are so liberated why do I own six pairs of really uncomfortable high-heeled shoes that I strap on for all formal occasions involving a receiving line and dancing?

These are the questions of our lives. As a movement, feminism seems to be on the wane. Not that the battle is over by any stretch, but I think it's safe to say that women have achieved quite a bit in a relatively short amount of time.

We are in government on all levels, we head Fortune 500 companies and are in all ranks of the military. The phrase "the first woman to ..." is being heard less and less.

The last little girl I talked to wanted to be a firefighter, not Miss America.

Having a baby is not the end of the professional world. It might change the focus of the world, but it certainly doesn't end it.

I'm in college and feel no pressure to get married before I graduate, or even immediately following. If I'm not married by the time I'm 30 I think I'll handle it fine.

No female I talked to felt it necessary to burn her bra, or any other item of clothing, to make a statement. Those bras are expensive, and we look good in them.

I think feminism has made women my age feel like we are not second-class citizens or even less important than our male counterparts.

If we don't notice feminism's benefits but simply take them as our due, then feminists have accomplished their goals.

Fraternity apologizes for controversial advertisement

Editor,

The men of Alpha Tau Omega wish to apologize for the advertisement run on Valentine's Day that caused some controversial campus discussion. The message that appeared in the ad was a result of human error and miscommunication between the men of Alpha Tau Omega and the Collegian.

The original ad was to read, "The men of Alpha Tau would like to wish a Happy Valentine's Day to the following women of K-State who participated in our philanthropy" (which was the previous evening). Due to space constraints, the message was edited. The modified ad was to read, "The men of ATO want to wish these women of K-State a Happy Valentine's Day," but unfortunately, we did not catch that the word "the" was not replaced by "these."

We accept responsibility for overlooking this unfortunate mistake and apologize for the error. Please accept our sincerest apologies.

Television, while sometimes factual, is entertainment

Editor,

I enjoyed some of the points made regarding the show "The X-Files" in the Feb. 18 opinion section. However, I did find portions of the article to be somewhat offensive. Hartman proceeds from the assumption that everyone who watches "The X-Files" wants to believe in aliens or government conspiracies. He generalizes its fans as a bunch of naive "droids," by implying we don't have the intelligence to watch more social-conscious shows like "Friends," a show I'm sure has benefited society with its thought-provoking dialogue and realistic insight into human issues.

I'm a fan of "The X-Files." I'm also a graduate student who has a 4.0 grade point average. And I'm smart enough to be able to discern between reality and escapist fantasy, which is what "The X-Files" is all about. So "The X-Files" isn't the most believable show on television. Whoever said it was supposed to be? I'll tell you right now that the Titanic didn't come close to sinking the way it did in the 1998 movie, despite the fact the movie won 11 Academy Awards. So what does this movie contribute to society? It was entertainment. Nothing more, nothing less.

I have friends in medical school who think the critically acclaimed series "ER" is the biggest joke on the air right now and is about as close to reality as "The X-Files." But that doesn't mean the show can't be entertaining. And I don't watch every show on television thinking I have to be educated in some way by it.

If I want to learn about reality, I'll read the newspaper or watch CNN. Criticize a show if you will. But for those who like to call people names and insult their intelligence for watching a TV show, I have a reality check for them: Sometimes, some of us like to watch television for the fun of it.

Survey story misled readers, slammed faculty, staff

Editor,

Your Monday edition had on its front page this headline: "Survey finds students dissatisfied at K-State."

Now stop what you're doing and listen to me, dear editor: There are several newspapers in this country that would fire either the headline writer, the news editor or both for a headline such as that one or for placing that sort of story on the front page, or both. In order to determine whether K-State students either are or are not dissatisfied, one would have to do (1) a random sample of the student population, (2) with at least 600 people in the sample, (3) using a pretested questionnaire that assures that there are no leading questions that would bias responses one way or the other. Thirteen non-randomly selected people doesn't tell us squat. In other words, you wasted newsprint.

That story slammed the university for utterly no reason. It alienated a bunch of staff, faculty and administrators gratuitously, and it gave an incorrect impression of the university to those readers who know nothing about survey methodology and therefore don't know any better when they read that story.

Hey, pay attention to what you're doing. This ain't high school.

Enjoy hazing? Materialism? Sign up for the greek system

If you enjoy buying your friends, being materialistic, meeting people exactly like yourself in almost every way, being stereotyped and suffering tortuous rituals in the name of forming lifelong bonds, try the greek system.

For greek freshmen, your friends are chosen for you the moment you pledge a house. Those greek friends are, at least initially, of the same sex. They belong to the same race. Their parents belong to the same economic category.

The greek system also fosters materialism. In sororities, the hurried Rush Week process doesn't allow the sorority members to get to know the rushees. During the first few days of Rush, hundreds of girls are herded through 11 sorority houses. The rushees learn the history, financial requirements and any other requirements of each house.

Sorority sisters are supposed to talk to each hopeful girl and determine whether or not she would be a good candidate for their exclusive club. But, because Rush is so ... well, rushed, there just isn't enough time to discover a rushee's true personality. Sorority sisters only have time to know the superficial aspects of the rushees.

Materialism and segregation aren't the only problems. The system also promotes stereotypes. Generalizations are impossible without first attaching labels and the greek system does exactly that, with letters. Each set of letters comes complete with its own common image. Everyone has heard this sorority is full of tramps or that fraternity gives women roofies. The stereotypes people attach to the letters usually aren't favorable.

According to Dartmouth administrators, the greek system is being forced to go coed at that school to promote respect between men and women. K-State's greek system should take note, because if the lack of respect is happening on other campuses it is likely to happen or has happened here.

Lately, though, the greek system has been trying to clean up its act. According to a Collegian article, four fraternities at K-State are dry houses. Several other fraternities are planning to become dry within the next few years. If alcohol were the only problem, that might work. But alcohol is only one of many problems in the greek system.

The system has also adopted anti-hazing policies. Hazing is the tortuous ritual that some pledges used to endure in order to become members of a house and form lifelong bonds. There are hazing rituals at other universities, like the one where you sit in a dark basement for 24 hours with a worm in your mouth. If a pledge accidentally swallows the worm, his "friends" will give him another. There is the age-old ritual, shown in the movie "Animal House," in which pledges are smacked on the behind with a wooden paddle.

The enforcement of those hazing rules is a joke. The punishment is clear from the recent sanctions against Delta Delta Delta sorority for hazing violations.

The Tri-Deltas now can only have one social event each month. They now also are required to discuss standards of excellence during at least one meeting. These are a few of their harshest sanctions.

Those within the greek system brag about the wonderful things greeks have done for this campus. Greeks boast of their philanthropy efforts through their organizations. That just isn't enough. Believe it or not, there are independent students on this campus who do community service. In fact, there are non-greek organizations devoted entirely to serving the community. Greek students who joined the system to do philanthropic work could find other venues.

Members of the greek community will argue that the greek system allows them to network. That may be true, but it is also an argument against the system, because it supports the good ol' boy network. For decades, minorities and people of lower economic status were kept out of positions of power with the excuse, "It's not what you know, it's who you know." It is an obvious abuse of hiring power. Is that really the kind of world greeks want?

Greeks also argue that they are held to higher scholastic standards than most students. That may be true. Having archives of hundreds of tests certainly helps. But I would hope that as individuals, members of the greek community would want to hold themselves to that higher standard anyway.

The greek system's rich history and tradition should be admired. However, just because a tradition exists doesn't mean it should continue. If we followed that logic, I, as a woman, would be whispering in my brother's ear who I thought he should vote for.

Outmoded traditions are meant to be abandoned. Maybe Dartmouth has the right idea.

Student fees have roots in WWII

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Full-time students pay $251 per semester for 21 different campus allocations. These payments are listed as privilege fees on their tuition bills, but that does not explain specifically where their money is going.

Every semester, K-State students pay a $64 privilege fee for their first credit hour and $17 for each additional one, which comes to a total of $251 per semester for 12 credit hours.

"The privilege fee funds things that are above or beyond the normal expected services of universities," said Ted Conrad, at-large member of the Privilege Fee Committee and a sophomore in business.

The biggest portions of the privilege fee are allocated to the Lafene Health Center, the K-State Student Union and the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Committee chair Jeff Meder said the Committee is special in that it is composed only of K-State students.

"We have a very unique situation at K-

State," Meder, junior in finance, said. "The Privilege Fee Committee consists of 10 voting members—all are students."

Compared to K-State, the Student Senate at the University of Kansas deals with an annual budget of $952,000, which is only the student activity fee apportionment. K-State's Privilege Fee Committee deals with an annual budget of $8.4 million.

"K-State students might feel better because they know they have some sort of input," Meder said.

Most of the time, the committee decides whether a request is justifiable and if student money is essential for the requester.

"The privilege fee had its origin in the late '40s as soldiers came back from World War II," said Thomas Schellhardt, associate vice president in administration and finance. "Enrollment was so quick that not all services could be provided."

Since then, the privilege fee has helped add a lot of student services to campus life, such as the Union.

"I remember, when I was a freshman in 1955, we did not have a real Union," Registrar Don Foster said. "We met in an army barracks with pool tables and a small snack bar."

Some of the biggest investments in the last 20 years were the construction of Bramlage Coliseum in 1983, the addition to the Rec Complex and the library expansion in the 1990s. Student health fees also rose from $50 to $75 in 1989.

Inflation also has caused increases. K-State charges higher privilege fees than KU. K-State charges $251 for 12 credit hours, compared to $214 at KU.

Last August, the reserve money reached the self-imposed reserve base of 2.5 percent of the budget.

It was the first year agencies legitimately could make an emergency request, Meder said. So far, the Union and KSDB-FM 91.9 have requested emergency funding from reserves.

"The enrollment rate was 2.1-percent higher last fall than we had budgeted," Meder said. "We will probably have a nice surplus of about $500,000 by the end of this fiscal year."

Privilege fees on the rise

Since 1978, there has been more than a 160 percent increase in privilege fees assessed to full-time students at K-State.

Proposal would boost military pay with largest increase since early 1980s

By LIBBY QAUID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A measure that would boost the salaries of the more than 16,000 active duty troops in Kansas won't solve the military's retention and recruitment crisis, Sen. Pat Roberts said Tuesday, but it's an important first step.

Passage of legislation is expected later this week to boost salaries for the nation's military personnel by 4.8 percent on Jan. 1, 2000.

Subsequent annual raises would be 0.5 percentage points above the rate of inflation.

Roberts, R-Kan., said the bill includes special pay to the 21,000 members of the military across the country who today are eligible for food stamps.

"I find nothing more disheartening or embarrassing than to know that our compensation in the military is so marginal that we have families on food stamps," said Roberts, a co-sponsor of the bill and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"America is facing a serious crisis in the recruitment and retention of key members of the military," he said.

The measure's other components include more generous retirement and GI Bill educational benefits.

Kansas has 7,282 military retirees age 65 and older, according to Department of Defense data.

What folks don't realize, Roberts said, is the effect of the state's military installations — including Fort Riley, McConnell Air Force Base and Fort Leavenworth — on the Kansas economy. Roberts said Kansas military operations contribute about $1.6 billion annually to the economy.

Roberts and his fellow Kansas Republican, Sen. Sam Brownback, outlined a series of factors that continue to stress the military.

"As a percentage of our total force, we have more troops deployed than ever before," said Brownback, another of the bill's sponsors.

"This administration continues to send our troops to global contingencies and peacekeeping operations—Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, the Persian Gulf, and now we are facing another deployment decision to Kosovo.

"This extremely high operations tempo is placing an enormous strain on our troops and their families."

Brownback serves on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Passage is expected later this week of the military pay-increase package, which is $7 billion more generous than President Clinton's proposal.

Clinton's measure proposed this month calls for a 4.4-percent increase next Jan. 1, to be followed by 3.9-percent increases in the next four years.

Either version would be the largest pay raise for the military since the early 1980s.

The Senate's bill also would provide more generous retirement and GI Bill educational benefits. It offers retirement planning options, allowing 15-year personnel to choose between a $30,000 bonus or a system providing 50 percent of base pay after two decades of service.

The measure also includes a thrift savings plan allowing contributions of 5 percent of base pay with no government match.

Sophomore Brandy Harris (left) is leading the women's basketball team in playing time this season and ranks in the team's top four in scoring, steals and rebounds. Coach Deb Patterson said Harris has been accomplishing goals this season even though the expectations placed on her would be difficult for most.

Harris' skills help lead team

■ Sophomore Brandy Harris uses athletic ability to make her a key element in the Cats' success.

By JON BALMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Some basketball players earn their paycheck from beyond the three-point line. Others establish a reputation in the post. Sophomore Brandy Harris said she wants to be known for these attributes. Harris has spent time blending her game into all five positions this season for the Wildcats due to injuries to key players and an abundance of newcomers.

Since her arrival in Manhattan, the Tulsa, Okla., native has used her athletic ability and commitment to learning to earn a spot in the K-State lineup, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"Brandy has been an essential element since day one to any success our program has had," Patterson said. "She has done more, absorbed more and performed more than any player I've ever coached."

That might sound like heavy praise for a sophomore, but Harris' numbers back up the talk. With injuries knocking starters Angie Finkes and Essence Perry out of the lineup for extended periods of time this season, Patterson said Harris has been the glue that keeps the Cats together.

Leading the team in playing time at 31.5 minutes per game, Harris also ranks in the top four in scoring at 10.5 per game; steals at 31 on the year; and rebounds with 137.

"We have needed her so much," Patterson said. "Brandy has not been allowed to have an off-day."

Thus far, Harris has delivered. Stepping inside for the injured Finkes, the 5 foot 11 inch Harris has held her own against taller competition. Currently spending a majority of her time at the four spot, Harris said there's nowhere else she would rather be.

"The post is my favorite spot, even though I'm a small player," she said. "That's the most fun I have."

Patterson said the expectations she has placed on the sophomore would be difficult for even a seasoned veteran to deliver, but Harris has been accomplishing these goals so far with only seven years of experience under her belt.

Beginning her basketball career in the eighth grade, Harris made up for her lack of experience by relying on her athletic ability to carry her through the learning stages in high school and on to her present state of sharpening her game, Patterson said.

"I played soccer and baseball growing up," Harris said. "It just took me until middle school to feel comfortable with basketball."

As her skills continue to increase, Harris said, she has started to become more of a leader on the court. Patterson said Harris, a quiet person, speaks volumes through her game.

"Brandy is more of an emotional spark plug," she said. "When we need a jolt on the defensive end or we need to keep the ball alive on the offensive boards, Brandy does her talking through her play."

This silent approach to the game is far different than many of today's basketball stars, but Harris is a player cut from a different mold. No matter at what position she is asked to play, Harris said she will keep contributing in her own quiet way.

"More than ever, I want to speak through my actions," she said. "I don't want to jump into it and talk a lot. I'll keep working at leading the team, but for now I'll show them something exciting to get them going."

Women's team could earn 7th-place rank

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The K-State women's basketball team has the chance to grab seventh place in the Big 12 Conference tonight, breaking the current tie with Nebraska and Colorado.

In order to do that, the Cats will attempt to topple the Nebraska Cornhuskers in Lincoln, Neb., tonight. The Huskers are 17-10 on the season and 11-2 at home. K-State is 13-11 overall, looking to secure a top tournament seed in the Big 12 tournament.

"I think it's a tremendous challenge that we've got in front of us. Nebraska is playing for an NCAA Tournament bid right now, and I think they understand that they are a team that's capable of playing on that level, so they have a great deal of aspiration," Coach Deb Patterson said.

The Cats have struggled in recent games, losing their past three while center Angie Finkes sat out with a possible stress fracture. Finkes will return for this game but will play only a few minutes.

"We'll have one practice at Nebraska, but it's going to be hard to come back after being out 16 days," Patterson said. "Obviously there's no chance of her playing 30 or 40 minutes, but we might be able to get her back on the floor for a few."

Baseball team adjusts to 'home-field' games

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

When the schedule for the 1999 K-State baseball team was made, 28 games were set to be played at home.

In Manhattan. Despite the delayed construction on the new Frank Myers Field, the Wildcats still were able to schedule those games to be played at home.

Only eight of those home games, however, were scheduled to be played in Manhattan, and five are already in the record books after last weekend.

So, how does it feel to play almost an entire season away from home?

"It's good to sleep in your own bed instead of being on the road all the time," sophomore outfielder Michael Colosimo said. "You've just got to play with what you have."

Freshman Brett Reid said playing road games and not having a definite home stadium is not as bad as it sounds.

"It's really not that bad," Reid said. "It would be nice to have a home right here in Manhattan, where we could play everyday. It is disappointing, but you've got to go through it."

For the appearances the Cats make in Manhattan, Wayne Norvell Field at the Eisenhower Baseball Complex will be the home stadium. Maybe that's not too bad, head coach Mike Clark said.

"I think the field plays real well," Clark said. "It has a nice

Seniors play last game in Bramlage, fight for win against Huskers

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

The K-State men's basketball team, which is coming off its overtime win against the Iowa State Cyclones, will play its last home game of the season Wednesday night. The seniors will be playing for the last time in front of the home crowd when they take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers at Bramlage Coliseum.

"It's going to be hard," Cats head coach Tom Asbury said. "These guys have had a real strong influence on our program. They've been really great kids. We've got three in-state kids that this has meant a lot to. These guys are really good guys, good students, good people."

"I'm going to miss them a lot. It's going to be hard, real hard."

Nebraska brings in the same overall record as the Wildcats at 17-10 but sports a 9-5 Big 12 Conference record, compared to the Cats' 6-8 conference mark.

One of the keys to beating the Huskers might be containing Venson Hamilton, who ranks seventh in the conference in scoring with 15.6 points per contest and ranks first in rebounds in the Big 12 with 10.5 per game.

Cats assistant coach Mark Fox said it will take a team effort when trying to guard Hamilton, especially after Hamilton's performance during the teams' first meeting. In that game, he scored 17 points and grabbed 12 rebounds in the Cats' 70-61 loss.

"His presence takes so much attention," Fox said. "He certainly forces us to focus on him. He does so many things to help his team win."

"Hopefully, if we can throw enough guys at him and play as a team to defend him, we can contain him a little bit."

In the first meeting, the Cats battled back and forth until the Huskers took a 35-25 lead at halftime and then built on that lead in the second half with a 62-50 lead with just 4:19 to go en route to the win. The Cats were led by senior forward Manny Dies, who had 19 points and 12 rebounds.

Hand in hand with the goal to contain Hamilton is for the Cats to win the rebounding aspect of the game.

"Usually the team that wins the rebounding wars will be in good position to win the game," Fox said. "We have to do a good job on the boards but not only on the defensive boards. We need to get the offensive boards too."

"We need to get the second-chance points."

In addition to Hamilton, the Huskers feature junior guard Cookie Belcher, who posts 11.9 points per game and senior forward Larry Florence who averages 10 points a game.

Three of the four top scorers for the Cats have been coming off the bench lately. Junior guard Cortez Groves leads the pack, averaging 10.4 points per game, while junior guard/forward Josh Reid and Dies post 9.9 and 8.9 points per game, respectively.

Junior forward Tony Kitt will be one of the big men who will have to defend Hamilton. Kitt is averaging 9.7 points per game and ranks seventh in the conference in rebounds with 7.9 per game.

K-State has defeated the Huskers in three of the last four meetings dating back to 1997.

Like quilting, golf requires special skills, techniques, but money makes it a competitive sport

JOEL WHITE

Whenever they get a hankering to practice their hobby without leaving the Delta Upsilon fraternity house, Earl O'Hara, senior in pre-dentistry, and Jeff Boswell, senior in electrical engineering, use their pitching wedges to chip a plastic ball back and forth in the hallway.

Sometimes the chip shots hook or slice into a room. Other times the ball lands right on the money.

I don't have a problem with the chipping game O'Hara and Boswell play, nor do I have a problem with the actual game of golf. Golf hasn't wronged me in any way. However, I always have had a problem recognizing golf as a sport.

"You must not be very good at golf," is the typical response I receive when I deny that it's a sport.

Well, I'm a poor golfer, but thousands of people play bad golf. They still like the game though, so that can't be the explanation.

I can explain my evaluation of golf with a comparison of the game with quilting.

Both golf and quilting require special skills or techniques. Both can be competitive. The grand-champion quilt at last year's State Fair knocked the judges' socks off. Neither golf nor quilting truly require physical strength, speed or a great deal of conditioning. Therefore, golf can be no more a sport than quilting.

Unfortunately, when making the rationalization that golf is no different than quilting, I failed to note the defining point that makes golf a sport.

On Sunday night, the realization came while watching the highlights of the Nissan Open on ESPN SportsCenter. I finally found out what separates PGA golfers from quilters or hallway chippers.

Golfers need ice water flowing through their veins.

The SportsCenter highlight showed Tiger Woods grimacing after shanking the ball into a crowd of people next to a concession stand at the 18th hole on the Riviera Country Club course. The errant shot eliminated any chance Woods had to birdie the 451-yard, par-4 hole and force a playoff with leader Ernie Els, who finished the tournament at 14 under par.

Then, Ted Tryba, who also needed a birdie on the 18th hole to force a playoff with Els, bogeyed after hitting his approach shot into the rough and chipping well short of the hole. He ended the tournament at 12-under par and in a tie for second place with Woods and Davis Love III.

It wasn't the pressure of winning the tournament for the sake of winning that rested on the shoulders of Woods and Tryba. It was the pressure of making a living.

Els went home from the Nissan Open with $504,000 while Woods, Tryba and Love walked away with $209,067. That means the difference between shooting a 14-under-par 270 and shooting a 272 was $294,933.

Imagine that knowing each time you hit a bad shot on the final hole, you lost more than $100,000.

A really bad weekend, at least for the six golfers who shot par, meant coming home with $6,244. Shooting 14 extra shots meant missing out on $497,756.

That kind of pressure can't be found in football, baseball, basketball or hockey, where the money is guaranteed before stepping on the playing field. A major-league baseball player makes the same amount of money if he bats 4-for-4 or 0-for-4 in a game. In the Professional Golfers' Association of America, one has to play well or go home broke.

The pressure of making a living is what separates PGA players like Woods and Tryba from a couple of guys chipping a ball around their house.

Aggieville barber shops offer conversation, haircuts, history

On the brink of a new millennium and in the midst of the electronic age, it might seem hard to find a quiet place to sit and have some good conversation, while getting a haircut.

However, there are a couple of places in Aggieville where students can do just that.

Aggieville Barber and Style Shop has been an Aggieville establishment since 1949 and has recent K-State football memorabilia mixed in with a taste of the past. Phil Kuehl, owner of the shop, said people still enjoy coming in.

"At the time, it sounded like a good deal," Kuehl said. "I enjoy meeting the people and being my own boss."

Todd Stone, junior in veterinary medicine, said he just stumbled across the 12th Street barber shop and kept coming.

"I think they do a good job," Stone said. "I've got to get my hair cut some place."

Junior Sicard, owner of Junior's Barber Shop, said he has been in Aggieville since 1967. He said meeting the people from all over the country and the world is one of the reasons he likes being a barber.

"I like meeting the different people and especially in Manhattan because there are a variety of people from all walks of life," Sicard said. "It just seemed like the thing to do."

Jed Mosher, barber at Aggieville Barber and Style, said barbering is among many dying trades such as carpentry and plumbing because young men want to receive more of an education.

"It is the same reasons in all kinds of trades like carpentry and plumbing," Mosher said. "Everyone wants to go to college and get a degree, not work with their hands right out of college."

Gary Wood, who is self-employed at Junior's, said being a barber is like being a psychologist at times because customers can't get up and leave, so they tell their stories.

"It is kind of like being a psychologist because we hear everyone's problems, listen, have sympathy and then work with them," Wood said. "They can't get up and go anywhere, so they have to just sit and listen."

Gary Wood, employee of Junior's Barber Shop, cuts the hair of 12-year-old Kenton Howell. Wood has cut Kenton's hair since he was first getting haircuts.

Salina to host flight competition

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students will be taking to the skies when the Salina campus is host to the National Intercollegiate Flying Competition April 26 through May 1.

The flight team at K-State-Salina placed third behind Central Missouri State University and Oklahoma State University at the Regional IV Safety Conference flying competition last October at OSU.

The competition is sponsored by the National Intercollegiate Flying Association, and its purpose is to promote safety, skill, sport and education in college flying. K-State-Salina also was host to the national event in 1998.

Roger Steinbrock, assistant director of college advancement at K-State-Salina, said this is the first time in the competition's history that a university has been host to the national event in consecutive years.

"The chief officer in charge of the competition last year was impressed with our facilities here," Steinbrock said.

"She talked us into pursuing hosting a national event because of our great facilities," he said.

Zach Griggs, junior in airway science and co-captain of the flight team, said Salina's attitude and being centrally located to all of the teams attending were other reasons the Salina campus had the opportunity to be host to the national event again.

"K-State's enthusiasm and motivation in hosting last year was excellent," Griggs said. "The location of the airport, its central locality and having a lot of ramp space also made us a good spot."

At 13,337 feet, Salina's runway is the ninth longest in world and is one of the few alternate sites for a space shuttle landing.

From organizing trainings for the 30 to 50 judges, arranging housing for about 1,000 participants and gathering sponsors for the event such as American Airlines, Griggs said planning the competition is almost a year long event.

Events also take place throughout the week, such as banquets, entertainment and guest speakers. This year's keynote speaker is Phil Boyer, president of the Aircraft Owner's Pilot Association. Griggs said it is also an opportunity for graduating seniors to talk to prospective employers.

"There are 20 to 30 different employers with booths in our hangar looking to sell careers and speak to potential employees," Griggs said. "This is a big deal for those in the aviation industry."

Steinbrock said 30 teams, each champions of their region, will attend the competition from across the nation. Last year, teams came from as far away as San Jose, Calif., and New York.

"We owe a lot to the students who volunteer their time," Steinbrock said. "If the little things go off without a hitch, then the bigger things look a whole lot better."

K-State-Salina placed 14th at nationals last year after placing fifth at the regional competition.

He said the team's experience will hopefully put Salina in the top 10 this year.

"We have a lot of the same members from last year making us a stronger team," Griggs said. "A lot of these schools competing are strictly aviation schools, so it would be really neat for us to place in the top 10."

There are eight events in which teams compete in groups of two or five people — the spot-landing event, the navigation event, the message drop, the manual flight computer event, the Simulative Comprehensive Aircraft Navigation event, aircraft identification, preflight check and the simulator event.

The purposes of the events range from doing a complete preflight check in 15 minutes to planning a cross-country flight on paper and calculating things such as distance and time. For the SCAN event, there are 50 minutes allotted to complete 40 problems.

Griggs said K-State-Salina's flight team practices Wednesday evenings for two to three hours on ground events and on Sunday afternoons on flying techniques.

He said the team is now trying to raise funds to pay the registration fee for entering the national competition.

"This is an opportunity to learn and meet those in the industry and to have an enjoyable experience by planning a big event," Griggs said. "The whole school is behind us, so it is easy to accomplish our goal."

Report explains differences in European, U.S. drug use

By NICOLE WINFIELD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — In-depth and impartial scientific studies should be conducted into marijuana's possible medical benefits, a U.N. report recommended Tuesday.

Only scientific evidence from the public and private sector can end the emotion-charged political debate over using cannabis for patients, said Herbert S. Okun, a member of the International Drug Control Board.

He said, however, that the board wasn't recommending easing controls on marijuana. The Vienna-based board is a 13-member, quasi-judicial organization overseeing implementation of U.N. drug treaties.

Among the other findings, the board's annual report said Europeans are the world's top users of stress-reducing drugs, while Americans have the record for consuming the most performance-enhancing substances.

While the reasons for such a disparity weren't known, Okun said at a news conference Monday that it might lie in cultural, lifestyle and other forces.

The aging European population has access to more extensive health care systems, which might be more willing to prescribe drugs to reduce aches and pains, he noted.

The high use of performance-enhancing drugs in the Americas may be at least partly explained by the prevalent sense of competition there, according to the report.

In particular, Okun said the board was concerned about over-prescription in the United States of methylphenidate, sold as the drug Ritalin, to treat children with attention deficit disorder.

American patients are consuming 330 million daily doses of the substance, compared to 65 million for patients in the rest of the world, the report found.

The agency also warned that more and more North Americans are smoking heroin and said Europe has emerged as a producer of cannabis and synthetic drugs. Cannabis continues to be the most commonly abused illegal drug in much of North America.

The report expressed concern about the prevalence of do-it-yourself guides on the Internet, which teach users how to prepare certain illegal substances.

Increases in campus-wide diversity benefit education

By CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The university has done a lot of work to become a more diverse campus, but that doesn't mean the work is finished, said Edgar Beckham, coordinator of Ford Foundation's Campus Diversity Initiative.

"We have a long way to go, but we are heading in the right direction," he said.

Beckham gave his presentation about diversity at 3 p.m. Tuesday in the Hemisphere Room in Hale Library.

Beckham extolled the value of campus diversity in his speech and gave practical steps faculty and students can use to increase campus diversity. He said increasing diversity requires everyone's participation and teamwork.

"Dr. Beckham is an extremely insightful person," said Ruth Dyer, assistant to the provost.

"He understands the nuances of this topic and is able to provide concrete ideas and suggestions for putting diversity into practice."

Campus diversity becomes a valuable educational asset when it reaches into all the domains of institutional activity, he said. Some of these domains are student recruitment, student life, campus climate, teaching, learning, curriculum and institutional self-understanding.

Beckham said recruiting students and helping students thrive educationally and personally is essential to the practice of campus diversity.

Increasing campus diversity requires participation from everyone, not just a few individuals, he said.

"We need to break out of our boxes and learn how to do what we want students to do," Beckham said.

"We need to listen, to learn, to engage and to work together toward a common goal."

Participation is not the only necessity. Increasing diversity happens through teamwork, Beckham said.

"I hope everyone considers himself or herself a campus diversity practitioner," he said. "Join hands and forces to move the campus diversity agenda forward."

Beckham said diversity should be examined in the past to gain greater insight into the present and a fuller appreciation of the future.

"I really liked how Dr. Beckham emphasized that diversity should not be an add-on to the university but should be an integral part of the institution's mission and programming," said Juanita McGowan, director of American Ethnic Studies.

The Ford Foundation has provided more than $20 million in grants to colleges and universities to help improve campus diversity.

"Talking to Dr. Beckham has been one of the most relevant in-depth conversations about diversity that I've experienced since I've been at K-State," Provost James Coffman said.

Students view documentary discussing racial issues on college campuses

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 50 K-State students met in Hale Library Tuesday night to watch "Skin Deep," a film about how racism affects college students, and to discuss diversity related issues.

Six multicultural organizations co-sponsored the event.

"Skin Deep" is a documentary that portrays the perspectives college students have on racial issues by showcasing a diverse group of students from campuses across the country.

The students in the film talked about their experiences with race, including stereotypes and discrimination, and about how they could help solve the problem of racial tension.

HALO President Carlos Contreras, junior in business and Latin American studies, said he hoped the film would bring attention to racial stereotypes.

"I think our attitudes can be similar to the ones portrayed in the movie," Contreras said. "Some people discriminate without realizing it, and this is all about getting stereotypes out so people can be aware of them."

Todd Nicewonger, student development coordinator for American Ethnic Studies, said an important step to ending racism is recognizing that discrimination exists in society.

"It's difficult to realize there is a privilege in being white," he said. "Once you realize that, it certainly helps you to move into the next level of breaking down racism."

Following the film, nearly 35 people stayed to participate in a diversity dialogue. Many students shared personal experiences with racial issues and discrimination.

Melissa Valadez, sophomore in voice performance, said it is difficult for her to find friends who can look past her ethnicity easily.

"I'm not sure exactly what it is, but I feel I have to prove that I am good enough to hang out with people," she said.

"I have to go out of my way to be a part of them. I'm really tired of it."

Albert Balendran, senior in electrical engineering, said the racial discrimination he has faced at K-State is unlike his experiences at home in Malaysia.

"In Malaysia, we have Indians, Chinese and Malaysians, but we all get along. We do not have this problem where I am from," he said.

"But at K-State, it has been going on since day one for me."

Contreras said he thought the dialogue was successful.

"It was a very in-depth dialogue and any time people can talk about diversity-related issues," he said. "It's a good thing."

Shaun Ball, junior in elementary education, said a broader base of people could be reached if more people cared about racial issues.

"I love to come to these discussions because I love to talk about diversity and racial issues," he said.

"But I'm getting tired of seeing the same faces at the dialogues."

"If people don't want to change, they won't. But if one or two people are touched each time, it would be a great accomplishment."

Plans develop to investigate Starr

By PETE YOST
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The judges who appointed Kenneth Starr have stepped into a dispute between the independent prosecutor and the Justice Department over the conduct of the Monica Lewinsky investigation.

The three appeals judges directed Attorney General Janet Reno and Starr to submit written arguments concerning whether the Justice Department has the authority to investigate the independent counsel.

Government officials have said the department plans to open an investigation of Starr.

The panel of appeals court judges, led by David Sentelle of Washington, D.C., was responding to a request for court action filed by a conservative group, the Landmark Legal Foundation. The group contends the department cannot investigate Starr.

The one-sentence court order is dated Friday but was delivered to the private group Tuesday. It requires responses within 15 days.

The Independent Counsel Act says a counsel can be removed "by the person action of the attorney general and only for good cause" or disability. If a counsel is fired, the attorney general must give the reasons in writing to Congress and the special court that appointed the counsel promptly.

Some department officials said that means she has the authority to investigate Starr.

The law allows the counsel to appeal his firing to the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., which could order a counsel reinstated if the firing is not merited. The act forbids any member of the special court from hearing this appeal.

Landmark president Mark Levin said that although Reno can fire an independent counsel, only Congress has authority to oversee the actions of such prosecutors.

"We hope the court's order is the first step toward stopping the attorney general's persistent efforts to undermine Judge Starr's authority and independence," Levin said in a statement.

The legal foundation filed a request with the judges Feb. 11 seeking a writ of prohibition against the Justice Department. It cited a federal law that says "the appropriate committees of the Congress shall have oversight jurisdiction with respect to the official conduct of any independent counsel."

Justice Department spokesman Myron Marlin said officials there are reviewing the judges' order.

One option would be for the Justice Department to question whether the special panel of judges has jurisdiction in the matter.

Department officials are weighing how to conduct an investigation of Starr's work in the Lewinsky case. They wrote Starr recently stating their intention to launch such an inquiry but have held off pending resolution of issues he raised, officials have said.

Starr questioned whether the Justice Department should be investigating him and proposed that the inquiry be handled by an outside counsel rather than the department's internal watchdog agency, the Office of Professional Responsibility. The Justice Department has not yet acted on his proposal.

Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder said Thursday that "we would leave all of our options open as to who might do such an investigation if one were to be done."

Allegations against Starr have come from legal observers, some Democratic members of Congress and President Clinton's lawyer, David Kendall. Among them:

■ Whether Starr's deputies acted improperly on Jan. 16, 1998, by offering Lewinsky an immunity deal conditioned on her not discussing it with her lawyer. Justice Department rules prohibit prosecutors from discussing immunity deals with defendants without their lawyers present.

■ Whether Starr or his aides had contacts with lawyers for Paula Jones, who was suing Clinton on sexual harassment charges, that were not disclosed when he obtained Reno's approval to investigate the Lewinsky case.

■ If a law partner of Starr's who allegedly did secret legal work for Jones could be said to have represented her. If so, Starr, who had not taken a leave of absence from his law firm, might have been barred by law from handling the Lewinsky case.

■ Whether Starr lied under oath in House Judiciary Committee testimony last Nov. 19, when he denied that court proceedings concerning alleged grand jury leaks by his office were sealed at his request.

Delays, oil prices prevent Iraqi humanitarian effort

By NICOLE WINFIELD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan presented a bleak report Tuesday on the humanitarian situation in Iraq, saying bureaucratic delays and low oil prices were preventing Iraqis from getting the food and medicine they need.

Chief among Annan's concerns is that medicine imported through the U.N. oil-for-food program is languishing in Iraqi warehouses.

The report to the Security Council also said malnutrition among infants and children remains at high levels.

The oil-for-food program allows Baghdad to buy humanitarian goods to care for its people suffering under U.N. sanctions imposed after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990.

Only half of the $540 million worth of drugs and medical supplies delivered to Iraq since the program was launched in 1996 have reached hospitals and clinics, according to the report.

Even though child malnutrition is high, according to the report the Iraqi government has contracted for only $1.7 million worth of high-protein biscuits for pregnant women out of a total allocation of $8 million.

Baghdad has submitted contracts for only 260 tons of milk for infants, even though the United Nations has approved deliveries of 1,500 tons, according to the report.

With pressure to lift or ease economic sanctions imposed on Iraq in 1990 rising, the Security Council has formed a panel to make recommendations on improving the humanitarian situation in the country.

Still, even Annan seemed to acknowledge that significantly upgrading the oil-for-food program is out of his hands.

"The most serious issue facing the implementation of the program at present is the growing shortfall in revenues," the secretary-general said. "Regrettably, there seems little scope for optimism in regard to oil revenues in the immediate future."

The United Nations began oil-for-food in 1996 in an effort to counter the devastating effects of sanctions on Iraqis, particularly children.

Iraq is allowed to sell $5.2 billion in oil over six months, but low oil prices mean that it probably will generate only $3.1 billion by May, according to the report.

Kidd, Beel announce candidacy

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A more student-friendly campus is the main goal of Willis Kidd and Adam Beel's platform for student body president and vice president.

Kidd, junior in agriculture economics, and Beel, junior in animal science, announced their candidacy Tuesday in front of Waters Hall.

Kidd and Beel said they have three ideas they would like to implement at K-State if elected.

Their first idea is a university-wide account. When students return to campus for fall and spring semesters, they usually have to write several different checks for supplies or campus services.

The university-wide account would make it possible for students to charge wherever they went on campus and then be billed at the end of the month, Kidd said. Students could check their account status on K-State Access Technology System.

"It would greatly simplify the accounts for you and the university," Kidd said.

Kidd said the University of Oklahoma has a similar system.

The second issue Kidd and Beel would focus on if elected is campus safety. They want to install more blue safety lights across campus.

"We want to install two blue lights that can be seen from every location," Beel said.

Having two blue lights would allow students to push one button yet keep walking to get away from possible danger, Beel said.

Kidd said he had a friend visiting K-State who was afraid to walk the couple of blocks from McCain Auditorium to Ramada Plaza Hotel alone. He said the safety of students is something that needs to be improved.

"That's going to become a recruiting issue in the next few years if we can't implement safety on this campus," he said.

Kidd and Beel's third idea is to give students a choice on where $1 per credit hour of their tuition is spent.

"We'd like students to have a say of where their tuition goes," Kidd said. "Everyone has something different they want their tuition to go to."

When students receive their tuition bill, they would be able to choose from five different areas where they want their $1 per credit hour to go. The choices would be Hale Library, Lafene Health Center, University Activities Board, a general technology fund and a general fund Student Governing Association could distribute.

Beel said he and Kidd are ready to lead the university.

"We are just a couple of new voices on campus ready to take the challenge, to present our ideas and to lead this campus to the next century," he said.

Kidd said both he and Beel are outsiders to SGA, but he said they both have enough experience to help improve K-State.

"We're just trying to make this a safer, more student-friendly campus where individual, common people have a say in what happens," he said.

Leader's trial prompts rioting

By LAURA KING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey — At a secret hearing on a forbidding prison island, Turkey formally arrested the foremost Kurdish rebel leader on treason charges Tuesday, paving the way for trial by a security tribunal. Prosecutors said they would seek the death penalty.

Abdullah Ocalan's Turkish attorney was barred from the hearing or conferring with his client, who has been under interrogation for a week without seeing a lawyer.

Ocalan, 49, leads the Kurdistan Workers Party or PKK, a rebel army that has waged a nearly 15-year fight for Kurdish autonomy in Turkey's rugged, impoverished southeast.

The conflict has claimed an estimated 37,000 lives, with the toll growing daily. On Tuesday, the government reported the deaths of 14 rebels in clashes with Turkish troops in the mountains.

Tuesday's hearing was closed to the press and public. Its outcome was reported by the semi-official Anatolia news agency, which cited statements from the judge and prosecutors.

Turkey has insisted that Ocalan's trial in a security court with military judges will be fair. It also has warned against any outside interference, repeating Tuesday that foreign monitors will not be allowed to attend.

The case is complicated by the fact that Ocalan has been on trial in absentia for two years for treason and separatism, charges which carry the death penalty.

A session in the old trial was scheduled Wednesday in Ankara, and the court likely will decide whether to combine the proceedings with his new trial. His arrest Tuesday was based on the old charges.

Ocalan's lawyer, Osman Baydemir, said he complained to the Justice Ministry about being kept from his client and said he was worried that the rebel leader may have been subject to "wrongful interrogation procedures."

Turkey's military previously has been accused of human rights abuses.

In Strasbourg, France, the European Court of Human Rights said it was seeking a "speedy response" from Turkey to its queries about Ocalan's access to lawyers.

Russell Johnston of Britain, head of the Council of Europe's parliamentary assembly, canceled a visit to Ankara to check on preparations for the trial. He said Turkey told him he was not welcome.

Kurdish activists denounced the proceedings as a sham.

"All these show trials are attempts to cover up... the plight of the Kurdish people," said Mizgin Sen, spokeswoman for the National Liberation Front of Kurdistan, the political wing of the PKK.

Turkish public sentiment, however, runs high against Ocalan. Protesters shouting "Shame on you!" surrounded his lawyer's car in the mainland port town of Mudanya, departure point for the prison island.

The Ocalan case has inflamed tensions between Turkey and its NATO ally Greece, which gave the rebel leader shelter in Kenya while he was a fugitive.

It also outraged expatriate Kurds and their supporters, who staged violent protests in Europe and elsewhere after his capture, in some cases seizing hostages or setting themselves on fire.

Scattered unrest continued this week. Provincial officials and witnesses in western Iran said two people died and five were injured in clashes Monday between police and Kurdish protesters.

A news report said nearly 200 Kurds, mostly young women, went on a hunger strike in Kazakhstan, and 80 more Kurds were on hunger strike in Dutch jails.

In Bonn, Germany, European law enforcement officials met Tuesday and agreed to crack down jointly on violent protests by militant Kurds.

German Interior Minister Otto Schily said the European Union officials agreed to improve cooperation between national police and intelligence agencies about PKK activities.

And in Athens, Greek officials were seeking safe passage for three of Ocalan's aides who are holed up in the Greek Embassy in the Kenyan capital. The three women fear arrest if they leave the diplomatic compound.

Campus beauty chief concern of campaign for Wooten, Shea

By JOBY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leadership, intelligence and fun are the campaign ideals of running mates Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea.

Wooten, junior in finance, and Shea, junior in secondary education, announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Tuesday in the free-speech zone.

Along with their slogan, "Voting for Wooten and Shea means never having to say you're sorry," the running mates announced the four issues for their campaign.

If elected, the two said they will work toward overall beautification of campus.

"This campus is kind of going downhill," Shea said. "I think there are some things that need to be replaced. I hate stepping on cracks because it's bad luck, so we need to fix that problem."

Beautification of campus would include fixing cracked and damaged sidewalks, installing decorative fountains outside, additional landscaping and improvements to the outside artwork, Wooten said.

They said a more attractive campus would increase enrollment and be a more positive environment for students.

Another issue, which is related to campus beautification, is to change Fiedler Hall into Fiedler Hole, a fishing and recreation park. Fiedler Hall is being built north of Ahearn Field House.

They propose filling the current hole, which will be the foundation for the hall, with water and lots of fish and other kinds of aquatic creatures. They said the pond possibly could accommodate jet skis, paddle boats and bumper boats as a recreational facility.

"It could be fun for the entire family," Wooten said.

The running mates said they plan to implement the removal of K-State head basketball coach Tom Asbury because of the team's unsuccessful season.

"This is certainly not the standards that we're used to as Kansas State University students," Wooten said. "We certainly need an improvement. We can't go much farther downhill."

Wooten said the money saved by firing Asbury would be used to fund the construction of Fiedler Hole and beautification projects around campus.

The two also proposed the idea of three free credit hours for students with perfect attendance.

"I think a fine reward would be $190 worth of free classes," Wooten said. "It certainly would encourage most of you to get to class."

Wooten has had political experience as former vice chairman of the College Republicans. Both Wooten and Shea are on the executive board in their fraternity, Phi Kappa Theta.

"I don't have much political experience, but I've got a zest for life," Shea said.

The two met three years ago through their fraternity and said they work well together.

"We're always trying to have fun," Wooten said. "We want to be the Ross Perot of the student council election."

Wooten said he thinks their views are representative of the average student and not of those students who get involved with student government.

"We're kind of outsiders," Shea said. "We like the student body. We like the campus. We're not just in this for us."

Rick Wooten, junior in finance, announces his candidacy for student body president with running mate Aaron Shea, junior in secondary education, Tuesday afternoon in the free-speech zone.

French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine. "We will use the next three weeks to convince the Serbs and to convince the Albanians that the agreement is a good bargain for both sides."

The Serbs gave no indication they would agree to NATO peacekeepers, arguing that they could not be sure the Serb minority — the province is about 90 percent ethnic Albanian — would be protected.

In a concession, the 81-page accord permits the Serbs to keep troops along the Kosovo border.

Final approval by the ethnic Albanians also is a question mark.

On Sunday, Albright had called Milosevic's refusal to accept a NATO peacekeeping force to guarantee security a "nonstarter."

"We accept nothing less than a complete agreement, including a NATO-led force," she said at the time. "Without that element," she said, the agreement is "just a piece of paper."

President Clinton said NATO Secretary-General Javier Solana still "has the authority in his pocket now" to order airstrikes.

"That depends upon the actions of the Serbs," he said. "What we need is continued restraint."

On the eve of a meeting Tuesday with Clinton, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott sent the president a letter expressing concern that U.S. forces "could become involved in yet another costly, open-ended and ill-defined peacekeeping mission" in Kosovo. Clinton has pledged up to 4,000 American troops if a peace accord can be reached.

In Washington, D.C., Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon said the administration would take a day or two to decide whether any or all of the extra warplanes sent to Europe for possible airstrikes would be recalled.

The contingent of Marines aboard Navy ships in the Mediterranean who have been designated as the vanguard of a NATO-led peacekeeping force in the event of a Kosovo peace deal will remain in the area, Bacon said.

In order to adjust to the loss of what Patterson calls her smartest defensive player, forward Brandy Harris has stepped into the post position. She said she expects a physical but evenly matched game inside.

"Inside they have some pretty big posts, but I think our post game may be a little quicker than theirs," Harris said. "They're really tough players, but we're used to that. It's been kind of tough without Angie, but I think the freshmen have stepped up and tried to contribute without Angie in the game."

Patterson said that with Harris' quickness and Nicky Ramage's and Olga Firsova's size, the inside should be well covered. She said the difficulty in losing Finkes has been the guard play, as Harris has moved inside.

"Our guard game is where we have struggled the most over the past four games, so right now Nebraska's backcourt is playing great basketball," Patterson said.

The Wildcat guards have a challenge in junior guard Nicole Kubik who averages 18.8 points per game and 6.2 assists per game.

"I think they have one of the best guards in the league in Nicole Kubik," guard Kim Woodlee said. "They play a different style of basketball. They're more prone to penetrate, and we're more prone to shoot outside, but I think we'll match up OK."

With Nebraska using a half-court and full-court press, Patterson said the key to overcoming Nebraska's pressure is to simply have poise and composure.

The Cats will play in front of the Husker home crowd, which has averaged 10,000-12,000 fans per game. Harris said this might affect some teams, but K-State has adapted to playing on the road.

"They have large fan support, so a lot of teams go in and maybe that intimidates them a little bit, but Lincoln's not really a tough place to play," Harris said. "Anywhere on the road is tough to play if you let it get to you, but I think this year we've gotten used to playing on the road."

According to testimony, King talked with a fellow inmate a few years ago about "taking a black out" to prove himself as a white supremacist. After his release in 1997, King tried to start a racist group and was looking for an opportunity to make a name for himself, prosecutors said.

King's lawyers called only three witnesses, who testified for less than an hour. King did not take the stand.

His attorneys appeared to have conceded the conviction and planned to try to save his life in the punishment phase. They said that the racist writings did not prove the case against King and that the convicted burglar covered himself in racist tattoos as protection from blacks in prison.

King's alleged accomplices, Shawn Berry, 24, and Lawrence Russell Brewer, 31, are awaiting trial and also could face the death penalty.

Byrd, an unemployed 49-year-old man known for his singing voice — and also his affection for alcohol — was on his way home from a party when he crossed paths with King in the early hours of June 7.

According to prosecutors, King, Berry and Brewer were riding around in Berry's pickup truck, drinking and looking for women, when Berry spotted Byrd walking. Berry knew Byrd and asked if he needed a lift. Byrd climbed into the back.

According to Berry's statement to police, King got behind the wheel and drove it to a dirt logging trail east of Jasper, where Byrd was beaten and chained to the vehicle.

Dr. Tommy Brown, a pathologist, testified that Byrd was alive for two miles of the journey along the bumpy county road. The pathologist said he could not determine whether Byrd was conscious up to the end.

Man admits to arson spree

By REX W. HUPPKE

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

INDIANAPOLIS — An Indiana man has admitted to setting fire to as many as 50 churches in seven states and claims he began his spree with two others who helped him burn a church in a satanic ritual.

The arrest of Jay Scott Ballinger of Indiana was made with the help of the National Church Arson Task Force, which was formed in 1996 to investigate a series of fires at Southern black churches, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday.

Ballinger, 36, was charged with setting seven church fires in Indiana and one in Ohio dating back to 1994, according to a probable cause affidavit filed by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

However, he allegedly said he set fire to up to 50 churches between 1994 and 1998 in Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, Indiana, Ohio, Alabama and other states.

Ballinger was arrested Sunday after going to a hospital with bad burns, which he got from one of his latest Ohio fires, investigators allege. Satanic books and writings were recovered from his home. Ballinger was being held in federal custody in Indianapolis.

Two others were charged in one fire: Angela Wood, 24, of Atlanta, identified in court documents as Ballinger's girlfriend, and Donald A. Puckett, 37, of Lebanon, Ind. Wood is in federal custody in Georgia, and Puckett is being held in Indianapolis. All three are white, and most of the church burnings in Indiana have involved rural white churches.

Judith A. Stewart, U.S. Attorney for southern Indiana, would not comment on a possible motive. The ATF said searches of Ballinger's central Indiana residence turned up a gasoline container and satanic books and writings.

According to the affidavit, Ballinger said he and the others set fire to the Concord Church of Christ in January 1994 after engaging in a satanic ritual at which Wood painted an upside-down cross on the steps of the Lebanon, Ind., church.

Investigators said Wood admitted she was present for several fires.

After a Feb. 6 church fire in Brookville, Ohio, authorities say a radio call for medical assistance was made from the Ballinger house in Yorktown, Ind. An officer who recognized Ballinger's name from a church arson investigation interviewed Ballinger's father, who said his son was badly burned when he came home early on Feb. 7, authorities said.

playing surface. It's nice to have a quality field to play on."

The only addition to the field necessary for K-State was to add pitching mounds in each bullpen.

"The city has been very good to us," assistant coach Mike Hensley said. "The game mound is in really in good shape."

The only drawback to the stadium is its size, Clark said. The field stretches only 325 feet down the foul line to the fences in both left and right field and 375 feet to dead center field.

"As long as the wind blows in, it's a fair field," Clark said. "When the wind blows out, it's going to play real short, but we can't do anything about that — it's the same for both teams."

The next time K-State will stop in Manhattan will be March 10 for a game against Doane.

Positions up for grabs

Clark said he has yet to determine who will start at many positions, among them spots in the starting rotation, the designated hitter and center field.

Freshman Brett Reid struck out 12 batters while allowing only one run and two hits in six innings in his only start of the season against Air Force on Sunday.

Center field has been a platoon situation with sophomore Michael Colosimo and junior Jimmy Moore. Once senior outfielder/closer Andy Silva returns to game shape, he could become the regular starter, as he was last year.

When junior third baseman Travis André returns, he could play at either third, first or DH. Incumbents Reid at third and sophomore Mark English at first have filled in during André's absence.

Junior J.D. Loudabarger, a starter at shortstop last season, has played the most games at DH and is awaiting the results of an MRI on his elbow before being ready to play in the field.

Schedule among toughest

In addition to playing virtually all games on the road, the Cats will face eight teams ranked in the Collegiate Baseball top 30 during the course of the season.

K-State already has played a three-game series with No. 20 Clemson but still must battle through a total of 17 games against the other ranked teams. They are No. 3 Texas, No. 12 Texas A&M, No. 13 Oklahoma State, No. 16 Wichita State, No. 17 Texas Tech, No. 22 Alabama and No. 27 Baylor.

Reid said despite the adversity and the schedule, the Wildcats could be successful.

"This last week our pitching has done a great job," Reid said.

"If we can continue that, there is no reason why we can't go to a regional," he said.

However, the site cannot be accessed by students until some technical problems are solved, said Indira Deb, systems analyst programmer, who has been working with the site.

"Since we need a lot of students' information on DARS, we need to download it all," she said. "Right now we are in process of downloading all that."

Woodard said gathering the information takes time.

"We're putting information in and testing it to make sure everything is working the way it's supposed to," she said. "We have to work closely with the dean's offices to make sure it's correct."

Deb said she hoped the site would become accessible within the next year.

"There are still a few glitches that have to be worked out," she said. "But we have been working to get that done."

Vet-Med addition could include biowarfare lab

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Preliminary planning is underway to build an addition to the Veterinary Medicine Complex that could be used for a wide variety of research, including studies on the effects of biological warfare on humans and animals.

Ralph Richardson, Dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the primary purpose of the laboratory would not be to investigate military uses of infectious diseases, but could include such research.

"We could research anything from two animals in a feed lot passing on a disease, to research on rabies, to viruses that cause kennel cough in dogs," Richardson said.

"Research can also be applied to food safety," he said. "If someone wanted to look into the possibility of someone intentionally contaminating the food supply, that's when we begin to talk about bioterrorism or biowarfare."

Richardson said the type of laboratory that is currently being considered would be a Biosafety Level 3 laboratory. He said it would be called the Infectious Disease Building, and the lab would be used to research other diseases, even if it is not used for investigating biowarfare.

According to the Center for Disease Control's web page, "BL-3 is applicable to clinical, diagnostic, teaching, research, or production facilities in which work is done with indigenous or exotic agents, which may cause serious or potentially lethal diseases as a result of exposure by the inhalation route."

Despite the risks involved with the handling of these agents, there is very little risk of any type of exposure to anyone on the campus or anyone working directly with the agents, said Steve Galitzer, Director of Environmental Health and Safety at K-State.

Planning for new building centers around research of infectious diseases

"People doing that research understand the gravity of the work they're doing," Galitzer said. "The threat is lessened because people would be more meticulous in their methodologies."

Besides extra precautions taken by those overseeing the research, Galitzer said, tight restrictions on how the research was performed would ensure public safety.

"The CDC has guidelines for biosafety labs," Galitzer said. "Their guidelines are very strict."

According to the CDC World Wide Web page, emphasis is placed on primary and secondary barriers at BL-3 to protect personnel and the community from exposure to potentially infectious aerosols, and to prevent contamination of the environment.

"The BL-3 laboratory is separated from other parts of the building by an anteroom with two sets of doors, or by access through a BL-2 area," according to the CDC web page. "Because of the potential for aerosol transmission, air movement is unidirectional into the laboratory."

Galitzer said these guidelines will keep the K-State community safe if the infectious disease building is constructed.

Construction, however, is still not assured, Richardson said.

He said planning has been underway for some time, but said nothing has even come close to being finalized.

"We're still in the early discussion stages of trying to put something on paper," Richardson said. "There have been committees working on this for I don't know how long."

Even if construction is approved and funding found, Richardson said, he doesn't foresee the building's completion in this for at least a few more years.

"Ideally, it would be as soon as possible," he said. "Realistically, the fastest something like this would be in the ground and functional is three to five years."

Before construction can begin, Richardson said, funding must be found to pay for the building.

Richardson said research into the components of biochemical weapons is on the table as a possible secondary use for the laboratory because laboratories with such capabilities are rare, and having one would probably help generate revenue for the building's construction.

"What we're considering is, 'Would it be worthwhile to look into this?'" Richardson said.

Overall, though, Richardson said he wanted to see the building constructed, with or without the capability to

Candidates for SGA increase due to publicity

By SARAH BAHARI AND ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate has 60 senate positions open for the 1999-2000 Student Governing Association general elections, and 148 candidates have filed, which is more candidate filings than in the last five years.

The increase in numbers is due to increased publicity and word of mouth on campus, Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities, said.

"We've had lots of people go out and talk to students one on one to explain what we do and why they should consider getting involved," Spencer said. "We tried to hit some of the living organizations and tell them about the opportunities also."

Spencer said it was also due to the decrease in the length of time commitment for meetings.

The College of Arts and Sciences saw the biggest increase in its numbers with 48 people filing compared to last year's 15 filings. The College of Business had the second highest increase. Twelve students filed under business for the last election and 34 filed for this

Bike registration to be on KATS by fall semester

By JINA HIPPE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students will soon have the option of registering their bikes through KATS.

Director of Parking Services Darwin Abbott said he hopes the system will be in use by next semester. Students have many options available through which to register their bikes, he said.

"A lot of students use KATS, and we thought this was another available option for students to register their bikes," Abbott said.

Bikes can be registered at Edwards Hall by filling out a registration form. A bicycle can also be registered at Parking Services' World Wide Web site. Parking Services also has a program in which registration forms are attached to bikes on campus; students can fill out the form and place it in a special mailbox located on campus.

Transportation plan passes House, 75-50

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House approved Republican leaders' transportation plan Wednesday. It contains neither bonds nor tax increases, but critics said it would bust the budget.

Republican leaders in the Senate were happy to get anything.

The House vote on the transportation bill was 75-50. Of 77 Republicans, 68 provided the majority necessary for passage, and seven of 48 Democrats joined them in supporting the plan.

In the Senate, GOP leaders had worried that the House would not pass any plan.

"The message it sends to the Senate is that the House wants a highway plan in 1999," Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said. "It's a document we can use to begin our planning."

Gov. Bill Graves interpreted the House vote as Ryan Crowell, Jodi Thomas and Robben Roesler, known collectively as Team 10,000, have made it their goal to get a record 10,000 fans to attend the women's basketball game against KU this weekend in Bramlage Coliseum.

CALLING all FANS

Members of Team 10,000 rally for record attendance at the K-State vs. KU women's game

The anticipation builds in their hearts. The pregame nervousness pounds in their heads. And when they walk into Bramlage Coliseum to the sight of 10,000 screaming fans, they know it's going to be a good game.

Team 10,000, a group of three students, have made a goal to reach an all-time attendance high of 10,000 fans at the K-State vs. KU women's basketball game on Feb. 27.

"You say you support K-State, and you say you're a big fan. Prove it," Team 10,000 member Ryan Crowell said.

Right now the attendance record stands at 9,735 at the K-State vs. KU game on Feb. 24, 1997. As of Feb. 8, K-State women's basketball was ranked 31st in attendance nationally, and its average attendance this year is 2,659.

"It's going to make a world of difference when we walk out of the tunnel to find 10,000-plus fans," assistant coach Sue Serafini said. "It's exciting to know the fans have our back. The fans are our sixth man."

Crowell, senior in mass communications and advertising, said half of the battle in achieving the goal is getting students in the door, and after that the basketball team will take care of the rest because they're an exciting team to watch.

"Try it once, and you'll want to come back," he said.

Admission and parking are free, and the game, which will be televised on Fox, will last about two hours.

"They play good basketball. It's always a close game. There's never a blowout. It's played really hard and fun to watch. Every time I look down on the court, they're playing 110 percent," Team 10,000 member Jodi Thomas said.

The game is Senior Night and is also the last game of the season before the Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City. Serafini said it is a good opportunity for fans who get hooked Feb. 27 to watch good basketball.

"If you had a sister or a cousin a part of something, wouldn't you want people to support it?" she said.

Crowell began volunteering his time to the women's basketball team almost three years ago when he met Serafini at a focus-group meeting in Haymaker Hall.

The same year Crowell began devoting his spare time to increasing awareness of women's basketball, the team made it into the NCAA Championship. After that, there was a snowball effect, and attendance began to increase, Serafini said.

Crowell then met Robben Roesler, senior in radio and television, and got him to help with graphic designs and other promotional materials. In December, Thomas, senior in public relations, joined Team 10,000.

"I'm an intense person in the fact when I get ahold of something, I run with it. I've always been a believer in surrounding yourself with people who are more talented than you are," Crowell said.

Each Team 10,000 member has different promotion responsibilities, including advertising, media releases, graphic designs and contacting organized living groups.

"It's tremendous. It's amazing to us that there's students out there like them. It brings our staff to tears to know what they've done in a short amount of time. Everyone is fully aware and fully appreciative of what they have done and what they do for us," Serafini said.

Thomas said the ultimate goal is the keep the group going and get

U.S. Agriculture Secretary to visit Kansas Legislature

TOPEKA — U.S. Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman will be invited to visit the Legislature in early April to discuss the crisis in the farm economy.

Gov. Bill Graves disclosed during a speech to the Kansas Livestock Association on Wednesday that Glickman asked during a meeting the two had on Monday in Washington, D.C., if he could come to Kansas. Glickman said he wanted to give his perspective on the crisis created by low prices and limited foreign markets.

Graves passed that word to Senate President Dick Bond and House Speaker Robin Jennison, who both were receptive to the idea.

Bond said Glickman could appear at a joint meeting of the House and Senate Agriculture committees in the Old Supreme Court Chamber at the Capitol, with all legislators welcome to attend and ask questions.

Jennison said he also would like to invite Sen. Pat Roberts, and Bond said that was fine with him.

Glickman represented Kansas' 4th Congressional District in Congress for 18 years, 1977-95, and Roberts represented the 1st District for 16 years, 1981-97.

"I appreciate his willingness to make that offer, and I am encouraging the legislative leadership to take him up on it," Graves said. "I can't think of a better time for the secretary of agriculture, who is a Kansan and knows these problems as well as anybody, to come and talk to our legislators."

Man confesses to burning churches in several states

INDIANAPOLIS — The curiosity of a campus police officer has led to the arrest of a man authorities say has confessed to burning as many as 50 churches in 11 states.

The Justice Department announced Tuesday that Jay Ballinger, 36, has been arrested and charged with setting fire to seven churches in Indiana dating to 1994. He was arrested earlier this month after being questioned at a hospital where he was being treated for burns.

Federal authorities also said they were looking into whether Ballinger and two co-defendants have any connection with the burnings of predominantly black churches in the South.

Also charged are Angela Wood, 24, of Athens, Ga., identified in court documents as Ballinger's girlfriend, and Donald Puckett, 37, of Lebanon, Ind.

Ballinger was being held in federal custody while undergoing skin grafts for burns at Wishard Memorial Hospital. Wood was in federal custody in Georgia and Puckett was being held in Indianapolis.

"We're aggressively pursuing leads in Tennessee and Alabama regarding these Indiana-based defendants," said Jim Cavanaugh, director of Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Tennessee-Alabama division. "We think they have traveled extensively down South."

Killer should receive life sentence, psychiatrist says

JASPER, Texas — A white man convicted of dragging a black man to death probably will cling to his racist beliefs and could lash out violently again, a psychiatrist Wednesday told the jury that will decide whether the defendant should live or die.

A defense expert said a life sentence would be appropriate for the 24-year-old former laborer.

Dr. Walter Quijano, a former chief psychologist for the Texas prison system now in private practice, said he based that conclusion on King's lack of drug use and the fact he used no weapons during previous crimes.

In Texas, a person serving a life sentence cannot become eligible for parole for at least 40 years.

"The probability of people at age 64 committing violence is very low," Quijano said.

Dr. Edward Gripon, a forensic psychiatrist who testified for the prosecution after reviewing King's writings and photographs of his racist tattoos, said he doubts King will shake his beliefs.

"Anyone who has white supremacist or any other kind of racist feelings, if they are heavily invested in that kind of ideology, it's not going to just go away," Gripon said.

The psychiatrist also said, "I feel he would pose a continued threat for future acts of violence."

The jury probably will be given the case today.

Independent counsel law faces changes by Congress

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The law that empowered Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr is due for at least a significant overhaul, and many lawmakers from both parties are questioning whether the legislation is needed at all.

The statute, which expires June 30, has few fans on Capitol Hill. The Senate opens a series of hearings today into whether the bill should be rewritten or simply allowed to die.

"We've either got to fix it or drop it and look for another mechanism," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., a principal author of the 1978 statute that was supposed to take the politics out of investigating high-ranking officials.

Senate Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Fred Thompson, who'll chair the hearings, said he wasn't convinced the statute is needed.

Two senators, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Chris Dodd, D-Conn., said bluntly on Tuesday that the bill should simply be allowed to expire.

Among the law's problems, Thompson said, are the tendency of prosecutors under public pressure to deliver a "rougher justice" to some officials, and to get "more involved in the impeachment process" than is appropriate.

Pressed on whether he was referring to Starr's probe of President Clinton specifically, Thompson declined to answer.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the panel's ranking Democrat, is one of the few lawmakers willing to give change a try. Even he admits having no ideas how to accomplish that goal.

"I have more questions than answers," Lieberman said this week in a telephone interview.

The original 1978 law was spawned by Watergate. It requires the attorney general to seek the appointment of an independent counsel when there is substantial and credible evidence of a crime by any one of 49 top federal officials, including the president. A panel of three federal judges then picks a lawyer for the job.

The prosecutor has an unlimited budget to hire aides and investigate his target — a frequent point of criticism. Starr has spent nearly $50 million on the Clinton investigation.

Black English teen-ager's case spurs legal overhaul

LONDON — Britain's government pledged Wednesday to combat racial intolerance and broaden laws against discrimination after a scathing 352-page report on a black teen-ager's killing decried the London police force as racist.

Officials promised to use the report to challenge every British institution — and resident — to examine their assumptions about race relations. They also agreed to introduce sweeping changes in policing and the judicial system.

"It is a moment to reflect, to learn and to change," Prime Minister Tony Blair told the House of Commons. "It will certainly lead to new laws, but more importantly must lead to new attitudes and a new era in race relations."

The fatal stabbing of 18-year-old Stephen Lawrence while he waited at a bus stop in south London in 1993 and the failure to convict anyone for the slaying has provoked a national debate on racist attitudes.

Gene pact dies without U.S. support

By FRANK BAJAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARTAGENA, Colombia — Opposing an accord approved by more than 125 nations, the United States and five other countries scuttled efforts Wednesday to forge an environmental protection treaty on trade in genetically modified plants and animals.

Washington, D.C., said it was protecting the world's food trade from potentially crippling regulatory burdens. Critics said it was doing the bidding of multinational businesses, whose laboratory-produced crops one day could sow ecological catastrophe.

The breakdown after 10 days of talks marked the first time in more than 20 years that a significant international environmental negotiation has concluded in disarray, said Michael Williams, spokesman for the U.N. Environmental Program.

The European Union and more than 110 other nations at the U.N.-initiated talks agreed late Tuesday to forge a so-called Biosafety Protocol, an outgrowth of the 1992 Earth Summit in Brazil.

The United States, Australia, Canada, Uruguay, Argentina and Chile blocked the proposed compromise, which would have permitted nations to restrict imports of genetically altered products.

"The United States has dominated these negotiations, and they've now sabotaged them. They're obviously trying to force genetically modified food down the throats of consumers," said Louise Gale, a spokeswoman for the environmental group Greenpeace.

The United States, the world's main biotech exporter, wanted a narrowly focused treaty that "protected the environment and yet avoided unduly restraining international trade" in a rapidly growing multibillion-dollar industry, U.S. delegation chief Melinda Kimble said.

Biotech products produce higher yields than traditionally crossbred hybrids with fewer chemical insecticides and herbicides.

Their patents are mostly owned by a handful of companies — from Monsanto of St. Louis to Novartis of Basel, Switzerland, which insists the products are rigorously tested and safe.

Critics, however, worry about the possibility of still unfathomable and possibly catastrophic consequences.

In the United States, between 25 percent and 45 percent of some main crops are already genetically modified. Industry officials expect some 90 percent of U.S. agricultural exports to be biogenetic within a decade.

Don Duncan, Department of Grain Science grain mill supervisor, will leave Manhattan on Friday for Anchorage, Alaska, in his Chevrolet Suburban. The trip, which Duncan is taking to see the start of Iditarod, is an estimated 4,000 miles one way. Duncan said he expects to be gone for nearly one month.

K-State employee begins 4,000-mile trek to Iditarod

By LORI OLEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two Manhattan residents will travel to Alaska for the Iditarod, braving sub-zero temperatures and a 4,000-mile one-way trip.

Don Duncan, Department of Grain Science grain mill supervisor, and his long-time friend Bob Lash will begin driving Friday. With side trips included, it will take about seven days to reach Anchorage, Alaska.

"I always love to travel, and we're not exactly going first class which makes it more of a challenge," Lash said. "It's the spirit of adventure."

The Iditarod dog team race has a ceremonial start March 6 in Anchorage. The dogs line up again for an official start March 7 in Wasilla, Alaska, which is 40 miles north of Anchorage.

Duncan went to the Iditarod by himself in 1994 after reading National Geographic and outdoor magazines describing the race and Alaskan winters.

"When I first decided to go to Alaska when the Iditarod was on, my family and friends said I was crazy and stupid," Duncan said.

"You just have to be an outdoors person to enjoy this."

He said Alaskan road conditions can become treacherous. Lash and Duncan said they plan to take six spare tires, two extra 5-gallon containers of gas, canned and dried food, and a cellular phone for emergencies.

"When I went up in '94, I slid in the ditch twice, had two flat tires, three rocks hit the windshield, and the doors froze shut because it was so cold, and I had locked them because it's habit down here," Duncan said.

There are long, open stretches of road, where they might not meet other cars for hours, he said.

"There are lots of empty miles," Lash said. "But I shy away from the city anyway and like the wide-open spaces."

The three-week trip can get expensive. Duncan said he paid up to $2.31 a gallon five years ago when there were long distances between gas stations. Lodging in Alaska is also limited, and many hotel rooms are filled with oil-rig workers and surveyors.

"Last time I went, I was counting on some warmer weather so I could sleep in a sleeping bag in the back of my suburban," Duncan said.

"No way did I get to do that with 18, 20, 25 below zero and wind chills around 40 below — you'd wake up an ice cube."

The cold weather makes dressing warm a necessity.

Duncan wears winter gear that is comfort rated for 20-below zero, which means a normal human should be able to survive comfortably at that temperature, but it does not account for wind chill.

"For blocks in Anchorage, people are lined six or eight people deep," Duncan said.

"You see not a carnival atmosphere but a neat atmosphere because everyone has their brightly colored clothing like skiing clothes, but at least they're warm."

The race ends in Nome, Alaska, and usually takes teams between nine and 12 days to finish. There are more than 20 checkpoints along the trail and veterinarians available to ensure the dogs stay healthy.

Each year routes to Nome vary, and this is the year the teams will take the southern route. Each team will travel 1,161 miles, but many figures use 1,049 miles to symbolize Alaska's addition to the United States as the 49th state, Duncan said.

Teams average 16 dogs, and nearly

Principal/Counselor/Student Conference

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1999 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU Academic programs.

You are welcome to drop by between 10:45 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, February 25. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

Students should help reach attendance goal

A group of K-State students are taking initiative to help women's basketball attendance. In a hallmark of student initiative, three students have started a rally to reach an all-time attendance high at the K-State vs. KU women's basketball game Saturday.

The group members, who call themselves Team 10,000, hope to break the record attendance of 9,735 from 1997.

Three students might be easy to dismiss, but their loyalty to the K-State team and their spirit for the game of basketball should be an example for all fans who wear purple to follow.

Basketball players always will stress the importance of the sixth man, that is, the support of the crowd, to the flow of the game. There's no better time to make sure the team has support than against rival KU.

Don't have tickets? Don't need 'em. Don't have a parking pass? Don't need one. In fact, about the only thing needed for the game is a little bit of excitement — parking is free, and all you need to get in is a student I.D.

All students should understand that the women's basketball team is underappreciated, without good reason. The women's team is just as competitive as the men's team, and the players always give their all to the game. In fact, the Sunflower Showdown has attracted KTMJ-TV to broadcast the game; there would be no better representation of K-State than to have 10,000 fans in the stands.

Columnist rolls ideas concerning multifaceted plant

VIEWPOINT

HARTMAN

To the uninitiated, the social life of today's college student is a minefield awaiting its victims. There is no sympathy for those who tread its terrain without appropriate warning. Here the warning is stated loud and clear: pot is a powerful explosive.

This warning in itself is relatively unimpressive, but the truth is spoken plainly in the laws of our land and in the life of the social being.

Through the simple illegality of this multifaceted plant, one easily can respect the power of breaking the law. In the eyes of the law, it is that simple possession of marijuana, besides leaving a nasty residue of THC, is cause enough to put one in jail.

Similarly, when a bowl is smoked, there will be no other recourse for the police officer than to navigate through the thick fog of these people's life-choice and enforce the law. People, no matter what their background is, have no choice but to endure the social consequences of their actions.

Those who choose to pick up the pipe and smoke it are not any different than anyone else in society. They are units in this massive macramé of civilization just like everyone else, and — from this — the products they reap, so shall they sow.

This dependency of an individual on society is not chosen, as much as one's misfortunes are chosen — it is contracted at birth. From here, so says, for example, Ralph Waldo Emerson in "Self-Reliance," some individual rights are sacrificed, in order to keep an equal and even balance with society.

In this case, our society has chosen to punish those whose pipe contains bud. This aspect of the law is unavoidable, and weed's proliferation in the college-age populace should be realized before one would partake in the society of college defenselessly. Here, this college society adds an additional layer of membership that conforts and confuses what is important and what isn't.

In this world of keg parties every weekend and of an annual helplessly maturing cohort of recent high school graduates, there exists the role of conflicting memberships. The weight of the college society's membership is interdependent on the general society, yet the immediate convenience of college society creates a blueprint for bud corruptible only by either a strong Freudian superego or constant police surveillance.

So the college student also can be faced with a choice, seen strictly and solely within the context of college society, where one either will accept the token or pass up the drug. In this context, one's last bastion of defense lies in intimate rational introspection.

Inconsequential of jail, the decision to smoke this forbidden leaf nevertheless leads to horrendous consequences. As a drug, weed will remove one's socially productive responsibility. That is, it affects one's experiences by distorting one's perceptions — and therefore reality — thus leaving the effected individual with an experience devoid of value in the reality of general society.

This process undermines any rational behavior that would lead to a rich life. Joining a club, volunteering for a cause, or even watching the History or Discovery Channel with some friends would at least leave one with a non-threatening psycho-social experience.

Smoking a joint, on the other hand, leads one inevitably down a road lacking in any possible productive membership in general society.

Naturally, to those whose smoking is a part of their lifestyle, they do not see it this way. They are numb to the dangers of transcending either the line of society's laws or the limits of one's self. These characteristics, if a college graduate is to perform dependably and consistently, are in direct conflict with the foundations of the common normalcy in laws and conventional society.

With this in mind, it is abundantly clear why the habits of an illegal drug that liquidates one's contract with greater society should be equally abundantly clear to all social entrants of college society.

At least a proper explanation of the situation could prepare a student who otherwise might be caught unaware by confusing personal feelings that arise unbidden in such a social minefield as college society.

The war is quite subversive, especially when the complex levels on which it can be waged are not yet applicably understood. This elusive and non-immediate nature of things collaborate to tease the hand of many college students.

Pot-smoking is a socially born manifestation that evades all attempts to nail its viral identity concretely. For the average college student, a vaccine is necessary or else one's life may take on an aspect that transcends the frail boundaries of both society's laws and one's socially productive consciousness.

In regards to Ken Wells' column, "The Invisible K-State" in Monday's Collegian — Ken, thanks. It's great to know the K-State staff is appreciated.

Who received the longest beating with the ugly stick — Dennis Rodman or Vanilla Ice?

I don't consider 13 people to be an adequate survey. It should not have been on the front page.

Intramural basketball refs are terrible. I think it stems from the fact they were picked last in kickball when they were kids.

Ken Wells usually freaks me out in his columns on the opinion page. But in the Monday the 22nd opinion, I thought that was really awesome. It truly takes somebody like him to stand up and say that our campus is run by people that you never see.

To the independents who think greeks are 1-800-RENT-A-FRIENDS, how come your best friend is a Nintendo controller?

To all the K-State independents — I think you should change your colors from purple to green, because you are envious of the greek system.

The Collegian needs to do more research before publishing articles such as Monday's about student dissatisfaction. By publishing that article, the paper is no better than a tabloid.

I just want to say, "Word to your mother." Thanks so much for the excellent article on Vanilla Ice. That was just amazing. Thanks a lot.

I'd like to thank Fletcher Jacobs for doing justice to freshman parking.

Print media should consider science an essential news element

CLARKE

Some years ago, I approached the editors of the Martlet, the University of Victoria student newspaper, with the radical idea of starting a regular science section that each week, would provide articles, news briefs and commentary regarding current research. Similar attempts in the past had not produced much enthusiasm — the previous editors, having come from a background in the liberal arts, had felt there would be little interest in science among the student body and were loath to tamper with the traditional formula of the student paper.

That year, however, the editors in charge were from the engineering department, and rather than the summary rejection I had felt my idea would receive, I soon found myself in front of a computer, collecting science news articles and interviewing researchers from across the country.

It proved to be a popular experiment, providing students with an insight into current scientific research while allowing scientists studying topics of less-than-earth-shattering importance to inform a general audience of the nature and significance of their work.

A brief experiment, unfortunately. After a year in print, I resigned from the Martlet to devote myself full time to my studies and research, hopeful the science section would become a permanent feature. To my chagrin, the new editors abandoned the science section, allowing it to fall into gradual decay. Within a matter of weeks, it had become little more than a collection of news briefs pulled from the wire service, and by the end of the semester it had disappeared altogether.

The significance of the Martlet experiment was not that the science section had died after so brief a life, but that it had even occurred while enjoying some success. The Martlet's science section appeared because the editors had faith that the student body of an institute of higher learning would be interested in a greater diversity of topics. It survived as long as it did because the articles were written by students with an interest in science who were able to present their subject matter in a form that could be understood by a lay audience. Despite its short life, the science section of the Martlet demonstrated that quality science reporting was a possibility.

It is an unfortunate fact that science is for the most part ignored by the news media. Science sections are a rare occurrence in print journalism, appearing occasionally as weekend features among the national newspapers but almost entirely absent from the smaller city or university papers. General reporting of science in the news media tends more often than not to focus on the sensational, dealing only with issues likely to grab headlines and not findings of significant long-term concern or enlightenment. Statistics are bandied about like gospel truth with little attempt to discuss the methodology used to acquire them.

Reporters play up non-existent controversies, granting equal, if not greater, time to lone dissenters while setting aside the consensus of scientific opinion. Strangely, it is the columnists who are most willing to venture into the field of science, offering columns based more on misinformation, prejudice and corporate interest than on insight, facts and reason.

Achieving a better quality of science journalism requires effort both on the part of the journalist researching the story and on the part of the scientist publishing his or her work. More than that, however, it requires some optimism regarding human nature and the breadth of public interest.

A century ago, the regular newspaper reader would have been considered among the more literate and informed of society — today, journalism is targeted to the lowest common denominator. As various editors past and present have informed me, there are fewer people reading newspapers, and those who do prefer their articles short and in simple sentences.

The headlines are written to grab attention, the article attempt not to risk losing it through the incorporation of too much information or analysis. Is it little wonder then, that after feeding the public a steady diet of journalistic porridge most media outlets fear the public will balk at the introduction of new, challenging or unusual topics?

I do not share this dim view of the public's appetite for knowledge. It is my belief that a well-written science section, tailored somewhat to community interests but still providing a broad base of information regarding current and relevant scientific research, can succeed in almost any newspaper.

This is, however, merely my own unsubstantiated opinion, and no doubt within the week I shall receive numerous replies from professors of journalism that dispute my fondly held belief with readership surveys and statistics. Still, with so little science reporting in existence, what basis is there upon which to judge whether the public will take an interest, save by direct experimentation?

After all, only by introducing science into our newspapers can we see if the public will read it. The question becomes, is the news media up for the challenge?

READERS write

Hartman shouldn't take 'The X-Files' so literally
Editor,

In a recent Collegian column, columnist R.A. Hartman made many revelations pertaining to the authenticity of the TV series "The X-Files." I would like to thank Hartman for showing me the light. The column, which was printed in Feb. 18 Collegian, had oh-so-many points of light and just plain hard-edged facts, it forced me to think about the lies being spread by such megalomaniacs as Chris Carter. I think everyone will now be able to sleep better at night knowing there is really no secret government, no mysterious black oil, and most of all, none of us will have any more worries of being plagued by fears of mass abduction by a mysterious alien race. Now I, among countless others, have been released from the burden of creative thought, and worst of all, imagination. We no longer are slaves to the entertainment industry's plots, story lines, and the addictive drug-like euphoria of letting ourselves become immersed in a fictional, interesting and thought-provoking story.

Actually, now that I think about it, Hartman doesn't have a clue. So what if he doesn't have the brain capacity to enjoy a well-developed conspiracy story? That doesn't mean he has to insult those who like it. I mean, so what if there is no secret government? Geez, man, it's a science-fiction story. Fiction. Perhaps these conspiracies and stories are concocted to create mystery and intrigue as metaphors for things happening in real life. Even if people choose to take everything on that show to its literal meaning, who cares? The point is, it's a TV show. Television is by no means reality, just a small excursion or departure from the ordinary mediocrity of everyday life. "The X-Files" is enjoyable, and I like it. I think there lies a deeper meaning here. Perhaps Hartman is a member of said alien-human secret government alliance. He's just scared because the show strikes a tender nerve or two. I advise everyone to be cautious and on the look out for any recent fields of corn crops being planted around here. Specifically those crop fields planted around large white, beehive domes.

The truth is out there.

Whatever the methodology, project deserves attention
Editor,

So, the headline is creating controversy. Nothing about the article, "Survey finds students dissatisfied at K-State," implies to us that the study is statistically reliable — as a matter of fact, bias is acknowledged to be present in the students' work. We would view this piece as valuable if it serves as a stimulus for the university to conduct research about the needs of students and to improve educational strategies.

Setting aside statistical reliability, one is still confronted with the fact that a variety of students, asked in a variety of ways, in a variety of places and contexts are dissatisfied with something that is significant to them in their college experience at K-State. Students who asked these questions expressed concern about their findings, discussing in a mature and serious way what might account for what they found. Not only were they concerned about why they found out what they did, they were also interested in what could be done in response to the findings.

It seems that our challenge at this point is to take what the students have learned and use it to help determine how the university community can respond in a constructive and student-focused way.

CIA warns of nations vulnerable to Y2K bug

■ Problems with nuclear plants, gas lines possible.

By JIM ABRAMS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Russian missiles, Chinese power systems and Mideast shipping all could face breakdowns because many foreign countries are failing to face up to the seriousness of the Year 2000 computer problem, the CIA told Congress on Wednesday.

Air Force Gen. John Gordon, CIA deputy director, said at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing that Russia appears particularly vulnerable, raising concerns about the safety of its missiles, nuclear plants and gas pipelines.

"We do not see a problem in terms of Russian or Chinese missiles automatically being launched" because of Y2K-related problems, he said.

But computer glitches could cause local accidents if temperature or humidity monitors malfunction, or Russian missile early warning systems might put out incorrect information about foreign missile launches, Gordon said. He said the Pentagon has been consulting with the Russians on how to avoid that danger.

Separately, a special Senate committee on the Y2K problem was finishing a draft of a report finding that the United States, while well ahead of most of the rest of the world in fixing computers, is likely to experience some disruptions in health care, electric power and food distribution.

"All sectors of the economy, many of which provide goods and services that are vital to our health and well being, are at risk," Sens. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, and Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., wrote their Senate colleagues.

Both Gordon and the Senate report said it is difficult to assess what will happen on Jan. 1. Within the United States, many companies have been reluctant to reveal their status out of fear of litigation, while many foreign nations are just beginning to deal with the "millennium bug."

There are some who "paint a picture of the collapse of society where roving bands of marauders travel the countryside looting supplies," Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., said at the Senate hearing. Inhofe said he didn't think that likely, although "I am sure that we will experience some disruptions in our daily lives."

Gordon said a main concern was a midwinter power outage that could have significant humanitarian consequences for such countries as Russia and Ukraine. He said Russia's Gazprom Natural Gas Pipeline network supplies more than one-third of Europe's natural gas and is run by Soviet-era mainframe computers highly likely to contain Y2K imperfections.

China, he said, is addressing the problem belatedly, but with limited time remaining "will probably experience failures in key sectors such as telecommunications, electric power and banking."

Among the draft report's findings were that 90 percent of doctors and 50 percent of smaller businesses have not addressed the problem. Half of electric power companies had fixed their computers by the end of 1998, but "failure of some parts of the electric industry's system is likely."

However, a prolonged, nationwide blackout was not expected, and 95 percent of telephone systems are supposed to be Y2K-compliant in time. Planes, according to the report, "will not fall out of the sky."

There is nothing to suggest this country will experience nationwide social or economic collapse, but "those who suggest that it will be nothing more than a 'bump in the road' are simply misinformed," the draft report said.

It estimated that Americans will withdraw an average of $500 from banks, and urged consumers to keep bank statements and take extra care with investment decisions. It also said that "stockpiling a small amount of extra food and water in the event of temporary shortages may also be advisable."

At the hearing, Deputy Secretary of Defense John Hamre said "our nuclear command and control system has been thoroughly tested and has performed superbly."

The Pentagon has been criticized as among the worst government agencies in confronting the crisis. Hamre said 93 percent of systems will be fixed by March 31, the deadline President Clinton set, and 100 percent by the end of the year.

"The Department of Defense is like a large ship headed toward an iceberg," he said.

"We have successfully changed course to avoid the tip, but we must continue our efforts to ensure we miss the submerged portion," Hamre said.

Casework offers job opportunities, experience for alumni

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Kansas woman in good health, except for an aching tooth got some unexpected news when she received her Social Security record.

It said she was dead.

She had no way to schedule an appointment with a dentist; health insurance wouldn't pay for a dead woman. However, whenever people experience problems with federal government, Congressional caseworkers can help out.

Caseworkers are employees of senators or representatives and work as middlemen between the constituent and the government agencies. Several K-Staters found their job in this field after graduation. Among them was Jamie Woodworth, caseworker for Sen. Sam Brownback in Wichita.

"You are an extended hand of the senator to help local people," she said.

She studied advertising at K-State and graduated in 1994. Woodworth applied for casework after she had worked in the marketing division at a manufacturer company in Wichita for two years.

"A friend of mine told me that Sam Brownback needed help to run his campaign for Senate in 1996," Woodworth said. "I was attracted by the job, and I knew he was also a K-State graduate."

She said she was pleased with her decision.

"I look forward to work every day. It is very rewarding to be able to help people on a daily basis," she said. Woodworth helps people who face problems with student loans, immigration and Social Security.

Today, Woodworth said she profits from her education at K-State. Her work in the journalism department helps her deal with the media news, she said.

Casework requires a well-based, all-around education, Woodworth said. Perfect oral and written communication skills are an imperative prerequisite.

"You have to know a little bit about everything," she said. "People need help because of lots of different reasons."

Woodworth recommends applying for internships in casework. Hands-on experience is important and looks good on the résumé, she said.

However, the scary thing about casework comes out during a campaign, Woodworth said.

"It means you have a job you might lose soon," she said. "I know people begging friends to elect their boss."

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., got his first hands-on experience with politics as a caseworker from 1968 to 1980. He graduated from K-State with a journalism degree in 1958.

"Every once in a while you have a home run, and you are able to help people out of an emergency situation," Roberts said. "That sticks to your mind."

Betty Duwe, state casework director for Roberts in Topeka, said caseworkers have lots of different academic background. She studied education at K-State.

"You have to have a feeling that you really want to help people," Duwe said.

Revenge fuels team in tennis match-up

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team will enter their next match with revenge in mind.

The Wildcats (2-6) will face New Mexico (3-3) at 10 a.m. Saturday to try to defeat the team that bounced them out of the NCAA Tournament last year.

Head coach Steve Bietau said he thought last year's loss might be helpful.

"Our main goal is to use any information we have about a team to our advantage," he said. "First and foremost, though, we need to concentrate on our own performance."

Bietau said he realized the importance of playing the 29th ranked team.

"ANY WIN AGAINST A TEAM OF THIS CALIBER
SIGNIFICANT."

After the New Mexico match, the Cats will begin Big 12 conference play with four straight road contests. Bietau said he thought the team is in a good position heading into conference play next week.

"We are improving on a number of fronts. Our health is one of them," he said. "Our doubles are improving. In our last three matches, we clinched one in the doubles and swept another in doubles."

Despite the improvements in doubles matches, Bietau said he was concerned with the consistency of singles play.

"We still have some spots in our singles line up that I think can improve," Bietau said.

Sophomore Anna Pampoulova and freshman Kathy Chuda have both won three consecutive matches, playing at the No. 2 and No. 3 positions respectively.

"They are both playing smart tennis," Bietau said. "They are also competing very well."

With Chuda being the only Wildcat to compile a winning record this spring at 4-2, Bietau said he is very pleased with her play so far.

"She is one of the hardest workers on our team," Bietau said.

Pampoulova has made adjustments in her game after losing her first five matches this spring.

"Anna has probably done as much to change her game and play as anyone on the team," Bietau said.

Bietau said he felt Pampoulova and Chuda have been important to the team early this season.

"When you have a couple of players who you can count on for a certain level of performance, day in and day out, it really helps to stabilize the team situation," he said.

Adding to Pampoulova and Chuda's play, Bietau said there may be a change in the singles lineup if freshman Alena Jecminkova can return.

"I'm optimistic that she will play this weekend," he said. "She is progressing each week and hopefully she will be in the lineup."

New Mexico has a 4-1 advantage all-time against K-State. The last time they played in Manhattan was February 1995, when the Lobos escaped with a 6-3 victory.

Earlier this season, New Mexico defeated Tulsa 6-3, a team that beat an injury-plagued Wildcat team 9-0 last month.

This weekend's match is scheduled for 10 a.m. at Ahearn Field House.

K-State clobbers Nebraska on senior night

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior night at Bramlage Coliseum Wednesday was more than just an emotional goodbye for Manny Dies.

The senior forward dominated Nebraska's frontcourt en route to 19 points and six rebounds as he and the rest of the K-State men's basketball team crushed the Cornhuskers 62-45 in the K-State seniors' last home game at Bramlage.

"That was one of Manny's best games," head coach Tom Asbury said. "He played with a lot of emotion. I think he did a nice job."

Despite shooting 42 percent from the field and only 38 percent in the first half, K-State forced 21 Nebraska turnovers as the Cornhuskers shot a dismal 32 percent from the floor.

"I thought that was a great game for us in lieu of the fact that we didn't shoot very well," Asbury said. "You have to give their defense credit, but we were trying to shoot well, that was the problem."

"We held them to 32 percent and we out rebounded them. I think our defense deserves some credit. It was a necessary win."

With the victory, the Wildcats added to their 64-58 overtime victory over Iowa State on Saturday to move to 18-10 on the season and 7-8 in the Big 12 conference. The Wildcats have won three of their last four conference games and have won 18 games for the first time since the 1993-94 season.

After winning four conference games in a row, Nebraska is currently on a three-game losing streak and moves to 17-11 on the season and 9-6 in the Big 12.

"Tonight, I think we took a big step," Dies said. "Jump shots weren't going down so we had to use our defense to keep them from producing. Every time we do that we seem to win."

"It feels great. Even the crowd got into it tonight."

Team's seniors end Wildcat years with strong Bramlage performance

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While the K-State Wildcats were defeating the Nebraska Cornhuskers on Wednesday night, the six 1999 K-State seniors were playing in their last game at Bramlage Coliseum. The seniors finished out at home with a strong performance, outscoring the rest of the team 47 to 15.

The seniors were honored with a ceremony before the game when the families of the Cats' players were brought to mid-court and recognized.

After the ceremony, the seniors finished out their last game at home with Jay Heidrick, Ty Sims, Manny Dies, Ayome "Paco" May, and Chris Griffin forming an all-senior starting squad with Shawn Rhodes opting to come off the bench.

"I'm glad they closed out their careers here at home with a good win, a hard win, a solid win, and a very necessary win," Cats head coach Tom Asbury said of the seniors.

"I wanted the seniors to go out and have a good, solid, memorable last game and I think it was," he said.

With the senior squad outscoring the Cornhuskers by two points in the team's 62 point effort, Dies matched his season-high scoring output, pouring in the game-high in points with 19.

"Manny Dies is a great player and he had a great game," Nebraska head coach Danny Nee said. "He played like a senior on Senior Night."

Death to the fair-weather fan! Sports enthusiasts should take a dose of loyalty

VIEWPOINT

MIKE VIETTI

Millions of people on the planet Earth stroll around each day with the explicit purpose of annoying other individuals. I am convinced God put certain people here for that reason only.

How else can Leonardo DiCaprio or the Backstreet Boys be explained?

However, no matter how many times we've heard the crappy songs from the Backstreet Boys or the number of times you hear women talk about how hot DiCaprio is, there is still an individual that surpasses them both on the annoyance scale.

I am speaking of the disgusting, revolting, repugnant fair-weather fan.

Seriously, think about the people who make you want to grab that moldy knife with old Miracle Whip on it that has been lying around in your kitchen forever and just stab them repeatedly in every vital organ in the human body.

The criminals on death row aside, these are the worst human beings on the planet. There actually are different degrees of being a fair-weather fan. The absolute worst cases are the people who attend a college and like that college in one sport, but like a different college in another sport.

Take for instance, all the unloyal K-State students who say, "Yeah, I love K-State football, but I always root for KU in basketball."

If I had eaten a burrito for every time I have heard that pathetic phrase, I would be fuller than Jeffrey Dahmer ever was.

How can one attend this university and be a fan in one sport, but not another? That absolutely boggles my mind.

I can appreciate the fact that KU does, year in and year out, play basketball very well, but that doesn't mean I should root for them.

KU is our biggest rival. Every student on this campus should cheer for the team KU plays in every sporting event.

Cheering for KU while attending K-State would be like working at McDonald's and hoping Burger King has a great night of selling Whoppers.

It simply does not make sense. People should cheer for the college they attend in every sport, not just the ones they are successful in.

I've actually had a few K-State alumni tell me they used to root for Nebraska in football before the Wildcats became a nationally recognized team.

Say what?

Those Cornhuskers are the monsters who used to destroy the Cats every year for almost three decades. In the years I have been old enough to witness K-State football, I have viewed the Nebraska football team with more hatred than Satan has for God—and true K-State fans should too.

There are others as well. Others as in the mentally unstable people who switch their favorite teams in professional sports to whichever team wins the championship that year.

Here's an example: How many of you die-hard Bulls fans from the past decade are still checking up on the Bulls' box scores every night?

I wouldn't be surprised if that number was less than 20 percent. Sure, the Bulls aren't the same team as last year, but if one truly was a fan of the Chicago Bulls, as many people claimed to be for their last six championships, then it shouldn't matter if Michael Jordan and Scottie Pippen are gone.

Let's switch sports. How many frauds are there wandering around proclaiming to have been a Broncos fan ever since the days when John Elway's team struggled mightily during the early portion of his career?

A good deal I would bet. I think it's a fairly safe thing to say that all those phonies who claimed to be fans of the Packers since the first Super Bowl and up through their last Super Bowl win a few years ago have switched sides to the Broncos.

Why do people do that? Are there people out there with such a low self esteem that they have to like the best sports teams to bolster their own confidence?

Are there people who simply can't accept losing in any form to the point where they will pretend to favor anyone or anything that is consistently victorious?

If so, I say Dr. Jack Kevorkian should be allowed to extend his services to include weeding out those types of people who make this world a worse place to live.

In order to officially become a fan of a team, people should be required to say a vow, just like in weddings:

"Ted, do you take the Denver Broncos to be your football team, through good times and bad, through sickness and in health, till death do you part?"

Afterward, people should have huge receptions with alcohol and crackers to celebrate the fact that they will never have to jump on the bandwagon of another team again.

Like Martin Luther King Jr., I have a dream.

Learning how to rest

Skip the sleeping pills. There are other ways to fight insomnia, said Kelly Quester, psychology intern at University Counseling Services.

"Insomnia is not getting adequate sleep or good quality sleep," Quester said. "This leads to daytime fatigue and impaired daytime functioning."

Students can practice stress management, moderate alcohol and caffeine consumption and exercise to fight insomnia. Students should avoid short-term solutions for insomnia like taking naps and using sleeping aids, she said.

Quester said that even though insomnia is more common among college think alcohol will help them through the night it becomes a stimulant. but halfway students, everyone suffers from it at some time in their life.

Quester said insomnia usually is caused by stress. Don Hedden, director of Cardiopulmonary Services at Mercy Health Center, said he agreed with this concept.

"Stress clearly hinders the amount or quality of sleep of a person," Hedden said.

Hedden said students might sleep better if they have what he called a "quiet time" before they go to sleep.

A quiet time is a chance for students to transfer whatever is on their mind to paper so they don't worry about it, Hedden said.

Like writing, reading before bedtime might help students wind down at night, he said.

"It is helpful to read before you go to bed, but don't read important things like homework you need to know for a test," Quester said. "Read enjoyable things like romance novels or thrillers."

Quester said stress, in turn, causes muscle tension.

"We train people in the biofeedback lab and in counseling how to relax their muscles and this helps them sleep at night," Quester said.

Taking a hot bath, like having a quiet time or reading, is another way students can relieve stress. A hot bath can soothe muscles and help students relax, Quester said.

"Hot baths increase the body temperature and will improve sleep," Hedden said.

In addition to managing stress, students should also monitor caffeine and alcohol intake, Quester said.

"People think alcohol will help them sleep, but halfway through the night it becomes a stimulant," Quester said.

Hedden said caffeine and alcohol do not necessarily keep you awake, but they will cause awakenings in sleep and decrease the efficiency of sleep. Nicotine has the same effect, Hedden said.

Hedden said caffeine can stay in the body for up to 14 hours and should be consumed in moderation.

Quester said getting exercise will help students sleep better at night. Don't exercise before trying to sleep, because then the body is awake, Quester said.

Hedden said he thought students should be careful taking naps and using sleeping pills, because they are not a long-term solution for insomnia. Taking naps and using sleeping pills can interrupt the sleep routine, Hedden said.

"As a whole, people do much better if they have a routine time to go to bed and get up each day, seven days a week," Hedden said.

"Taking a nap for 10 or 15 minutes after you've been awake for eight hours is OK, but don't nap too close to bedtime and don't nap for two hours. This will disrupt consolidated sleep."

STORY BY CRISTY ANDERSON ■

ART BY TODD PETERSEN

Like napping, sleeping pills are another short-term solution.

"Sleeping pills may be good for short term," Quester said, "but if you stop taking them, it will take two or three times as long as it should to reestablish your sleep cycle. There are legitimate reasons to use sleep aids, but you should see a doctor first."

Hedden said he agreed.

"To break an insomnia sequence, using sleeping pills is not that big of a deal," he said. "It should not be done on a regular basis. A person should seek medical advice."

Hedden said the body gets used to a sleep pattern, and sleep is affected if the pattern is disrupted.

It's important to find out how much sleep your body needs to function well and get into a routine, Hedden said.

"Statistically, 8 1/2 hours of night is what the average person needs."

Quester said each person needs a different amount of sleep each night.

Some people need only four hours of sleep to function properly during the day, but others need nine hours, Quester said.

"Statistically, 8 1/2 hours of sleep a night is what the average person needs," Hedden said. "If you cannot improve the amount and quality of your sleep on your own, you should see a doctor."

If left untreated, insomnia can lead to heart problems, high blood pressure or strokes, Hedden said.

Quester also said insomnia can be serious because it is responsible for some motor vehicle accidents.

Hedden said medical treatment for sleeping problems can be expensive, but patients find it is well worth the money and time.

Band to debut tonight with Auntie Mae's gig

By JOEY ECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mama's Groove Complex, a newly formed cover band, will give its debut performance at Auntie Mae's Parlor tonight.

Brian Brooks, senior in marketing and drummer for the band, described its sound as "disco-rock with soul." He said the band mainly plays songs from musical groups and artists such as the Dave Matthews Band, Fiona Apple, Garbage and Tori Amos. Brooks said the band also will play a few of its own original songs.

"We play a wide variety of music," said Elisa Harry, junior in kinesiology and singer for the band. "We play jazz, funk, classical, metal and alternative."

Brooks said he got the idea for the band because he thought Manhattan needed live music by well-known artists that could be played at parties.

"We're not out to impress everybody, we're just out to have a good time," Brooks said. "We're here to play music that people can dance to and that people are familiar with."

The band has four members: Harry, who is the lead singer; Kevin Pierce on guitar; Brooks, who is the drummer; and Ernie Jackson on bass.

Brooks, part of the jazz group Wasted Potential, which performs every Friday night at Auntie Mae's, said he thinks the originality of the band comes from Harry's vocals.

"To have a female singing songs by Dave Matthews and U2, I think gives a really different sound," he said.

Jeff Denney, manager of Auntie Mae's, said the show will start at 10:30 p.m. and there will be a $1 cover charge.

Harry said she thinks the Manhattan scene will enjoy the show due to the variety of music performed.

"I'm just really excited about it," she said. "I'm ready to get out there and see what happens."

'Largo Desolato' plays on audience's fear of unknown

By DIANA LEE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ambiguity and fear of the unknown lurk under the surface in a play taking over the Purple Masque Theatre this weekend.

"Largo Desolato," which plays at 8 p.m. tonight, Friday and Saturday, is the story of a man who is trapped in his apartment. He is expecting someone to come, but he doesn't know who it will be, when he or she will come or what will happen upon arrival.

"The main character, Leopold, is an author who has written an essay and is now in trouble for what he has written," said Karl Rutherford, director of the play and graduate student in speech communication, theater and dance.

Doug Hurley, graduate student in speech communication, theater and dance, plays Leopold. He said that while the situation surrounding his character is ambiguous, his motives are not.

"It's not like the character is ambiguous," Hurley said. "Everyone has a definite idea of how they feel about certain things, even when their situations are complicated and unknown."

The set incorporates six doors, which add to the feeling of there being something unknown out there.

"The big, looming presence of the doors is one way to symbolize this looming presence and the sense of ambiguity," Hurley said.

Hurley also said the sense of an ominous, unknown element is one of the factors that gives the play a sense of realism.

"The ambiguity is nice. It is much worse to not know what will happen to you than to be sentenced to six months in jail or something," he said. "It's all about the fear of the unknown."

Rutherford said one of the reasons he wanted to direct this play was its universal message.

"It's a chance to take something anyone could have to deal with on a daily basis and give it a sense of personal resonance," he said.

Rutherford also said he wanted to keep the costumes simple and modern to add to the sense of universality.

"If it was set in a particular time it would take away from the message and cause people to think, 'Oh, that just happened then and it's not something that applies to me now,' which is a main theme of the piece."

Rutherford is directing the piece as a project for his graduate studies.

Senate approves military-pay hike

■ Cohen says raise might be counterproductive.

By TOM RAUM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to give the nation's military the biggest benefits increase since the early 1980s, including an across-the-board 4.8-percent pay increase with further boosts in future years.

The pay raise for the nation's 1.4 million active-duty military is half a percentage point more generous than one proposed earlier this month by President Clinton. It was approved 91-8.

Republican leaders said they wanted the first Senate bill passed this year to telegraph support for U.S. troops, particularly in light of a possible new deployment to Kosovo — even if it wasn't known exactly how the package would be financed.

"IT WOULD BE INSANITY FOR US NOT TO DO THIS BILL, AND DO IT NOW."

— TRENT LOTT,
SENATE MAJORITY LEADER

"This is the right way to begin this year," Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., said. "It comes at a time when we're asking more and more of our military with less and less. It would be insanity for us not to do this bill, and do it now."

The package, which now goes to the House, would also boost retirement and educational benefits under the GI bill.

Some Democrats tried to get the Senate to consider a series of taxes to pay for the measure but were turned back on an 80-20 procedural vote. They then lined up with Republicans in support of the overall measure.

The pay increase will take effect next Jan. 1.

That could cost at least $7 billion more over five years than the package Clinton proposed. Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., said the added cost could rise to $16.5 billion over 10 years.

"That is not the message we want to send to the American people," Graham said, warning it would start the United States "down the slippery slope to more deficits."

After the initial 4.8-percent increase under the legislation, service members would get additional raises in subsequent years of 0.5 percentage point above the rate of inflation. Clinton's measure calls for an initial 4.4-percent increase next Jan. 1, to be followed by 3.9-percent increases in each of the next four years.

The Senate legislation, like the administration bill, also would allow for additional targeted pay raises to reward performance.

Voting no on the final bill were five Democrats and three Republicans: Sens. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn.; Richard Durbin, D-Ill.; Russell Feingold, D-Wis.; Graham; Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn.; Judd Gregg, R-N.H.; Don Nickles, R-Okla.; and George Voinovich, R-Ohio. Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, D-N.Y., did not vote.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services

Committee, said that even though the bill was costly, it would "send a signal to the men and women of the armed services that this is the type of priority that we attach to their pay, retirement and other benefits."

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Armed Services Committee, said the measure provided needed increases for the nation's military, even though "this is an extremely expensive bill and it has not been paid for."

The legislation would also:

- Allow military personnel to retire at 50-percent pay after 20 years service — a plan that was in effect before 1986 — or accept a $30,000 cash bonus and join the current retirement system.

- Allow service members to contribute up to 5 percent of their basic pay to a 401(k) type savings account.

- Make educational benefits under the GI Bill more generous by increasing the monthly stipend from $528 to $600 and eliminating the $1,200 that military members now must pay up front to be eligible. Under certain circumstances, unused GI educational benefits could be transferred to other family members.

- Provide a special subsistence bonus of $180 per month for needy military families who are forced to rely on food stamps. Between 8,000 and 16,000 U.S. military service members are receiving food stamps.

- Establish a three-year demonstration program to allow veterans hospitals, in some circumstances, to bill Medicare for medical treatment for veterans.

Supporters cited low morale of troops, the difficulty the military has meeting recruitment goals and a disparity of pay between the military and civilian work force as reasons for the benefits package.

Defense Secretary William Cohen wrote to the Senate that the measure could be counterproductive if the funds could not be found to pay for the increase and had to be found by cutting other military programs. The administration was not expected to formally oppose the increase, congressional Democrats said.

Sponsors of the bill said ways to pay for the package could be worked out later.

"Our bill will have profound and immediate positive effects on morale and retention," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said.

Eric Byer, chairman for Engineering Week, drops an egg inside of a paper enclosure off a third floor balcony in Durland Hall. Middle schoolers from around Kansas competed in the egg-drop contest Wednesday afternoon.

Middle-school students test engineering ingenuity in student-run contest

A broken-down bus did not keep 22 Ottawa, Kan., students from protecting their eggs Wednesday.

"Our bus broke down on the way here," said Kyle Huschka, Ottawa Middle School seventh grader. "I think it was leaking antifreeze."

Huschka was one of 125 students from six area middle schools who participated in the National Society of Professional Engineers' Egg Drop Contest, in which students were given an hour and a half to build a device that would keep an egg from breaking after it was dropped 40 feet.

Dee Killough, seventh grade science teacher at Ottawa, said her students did not want to turn around when the bus broke down outside of Topeka.

"We really wanted to be here," she said. "We took our chances and it got us here."

Huschka worked with Hannah Peterson and Heather Wilson, also Ottawa seventh graders, in the competition as a team.

"We're named Inevitably," Huschka said. "Because I have a math teacher who says it all the time."

The students were given a white poster board, two paper clips and a bottle of glue. Team Inevitably built a pyramid-like structure filled with scraps of paper.

"We're putting the egg right on the inside," Huschka said. "There's a basket for the egg to sit in, so hopefully it won't hit the bottom. But if it does, we're putting in paper for it to fall on."

They built the devices on the second floor of the K-State Student Union. The structures were then taken to Rathbone Hall to be weighed and tested. The contest was sponsored by NSPE as part of Engineering Week.

"The primary purpose of it is to get these middle school kids interested in the fields of math and science," said Eric Byer, junior in industrial engineering and Engineering Week chairman. "It lets them see what can be done with it and possibly they'll grow up to be future engineers."

The devices were taken to Rathbone at 1 p.m. and dropped from the third floor onto a tarp. Awards were given to the three lightest devices that kept eggs from breaking, as well as an award for Most Creative Design and Biggest Splat.

Although Wilson said she hoped to win, victory was not inevitable for her team. When their device was dropped at around 1:30 p.m., the egg broke as soon as it hit the ground.

"It didn't have enough padding," Wilson said. "It had too much weight on the top and not enough weight on the bottom."

Peterson said she hoped to participate next year because she would know what to expect.

"We'll have more ideas and know a better way to make it," she said.

The Cracked Eggs from Wamego Middle School took first place, Rock Bottom from Ottawa Middle School received the Biggest Splat award and The Deviled Eggs from Royal Valley Middle School received the Most Creative Design award.

"I wish we could have won," Wilson said. "But we had a lot of fun and it was a good experience."

term. Human ecology was the only college not to double its number of filings.

Spencer said the increase in the numbers could make Student Senate stronger.

"The people who are the most interested will be the ones to get elected," she said. "Hopefully these people will feel an even greater sense of responsibility for their constituents."

Spencer said SGA hopes to keep its numbers up in following years.

"We have to keep doing more of the same thing," she said. "Once people are elected, we have to get them trained well, and everything else will fall into place."

Being a senator is a great way to get involved with issues on campus, Spencer said.

"Historically, the administration has shown that they listen to the students," she said. "It's a great way to be a voice on campus and represent your fellow students."

The Union Governing Board had 11 candidates file for a one year position. Bernard Pitts, union director, said the difference this year was that SGA was good about getting out and telling people how to get involved. Marketing the election also helped gain more interest for students running.

"We want students to become involved in the day-to-day decision process of student government," Pitts said. "Being on the senate will then provide them with the opportunity to do so."

Cherie Hodgson, academic advisor in the College of Business, said students who study in business can also use student senate as a good experience and as a working tool. She said the College of Business encourages its students get involved with different student activities on campus.

"The involvement with the senate will allow the students to incorporate school into their daily lives," Hodgson said. "As well as develop skills they can use in the future."

The College of Business also offers a leadership program in which students can minor, which can then be utilized in their effort to run for senate. What students learn in the program they can gain in experience of holding a position in the senate, Hodgson said.

Although many students are running for a seat in senate to represent their college, nobody from the College of Veterinary Medicine filed for its one available seat.

Associate Dean Ronnie Elmore said he felt that having representation in senate was important, but that students studying veterinary medicine are very busy with 20-25 semester hours; thus, it is very hard to get anyone to file.

"Students have time constraints with studying and taking laboratory courses," Elmore said.

However, Elmore said he felt that having no representation is unfair because there are issues that affect vet-med students.

"With no one there to represent vet-med, the issues may be passed without input from anyone from our college, so we do keep trying to encourage students to run," Elmore said.

Sarah Dillingham, adviser to the Elections Committee, said the numbers reflected an increase in overall campus involvement.

"This is so wonderful. Students are showing that they want to get involved within their majors and on campus," she said. "This should have a positive impact on K-State."

"Right now our student government is rated first in the country," Dillingham said. "We just have to keep doing what we've been doing that got us here."

Bond did.

"I find it of great significance that, this early in the session, people are willing to stand up on this issue," Graves told a meeting of the Kansas Livestock Association.

The House plan would dedicate $2.1 billion in new revenues over eight years to highway improvements and aid for rural airports, public bus systems and short-line railroads.

Supporters said they believe the state will have enough money from tax collections that grow with the economy — if legislators do not increase taxes for at least several years.

Critics said the bill would take all the state's extra money and divert it to the transportation program. They said the state would not be able to increase spending on public schools or social-service programs.

Also, the assumption that legislators would not decrease taxes seemed dubious.

The same day it approved the transportation plan, the House approved a proposal to phase out the state's 4.9-percent sales tax on groceries over three years as an amendment to a small tax bill.

"The governor really didn't give us a good place to start, and I don't think the House has either," Senate Minority Leader Anthony Hensley, D-Topeka, said.

Graves' plan is unacceptable to many legislators — the House unanimously rejected it as an amendment to its bill — because it relies heavily on bonding. His plan would raise $2.4 billion in new revenues over eight years, including $2.1 billion from bonds.

The House plan is $300 million smaller than Graves' proposal. The difference would come out of the governor's proposal to spend $1 billion over eight years on highways, interchanges and bypasses, projects known as system enhancements.

The system enhancements are the most expensive and most politically popular projects.

Graves' plan disappointed some advocates of a new plan, and the House plan would finance only $700 million worth.

"It's about half enough," said Rep. John Edmonds, R-Great Bend, who still voted for the bill. "Nevertheless, we need to start somewhere."

KATS

Abbott said Parking Services is trying to make the registration process easier for "students."

"This is a quick and efficient method and hopefully lots of students will use it," he said.

Abbott said registering bikes is important.

"Registration is free, but mandatory," Abbott said. "If bikes are stolen, we are able to return them to their owner if they are registered."

Seth Galitzer, applications programmer for the division of safety, said there is another reason for students to register their bikes.

"By students registering their bikes, it gives us a good idea about how much money to use to support bicycles on campus with bike paths and bike racks," he said.

Parking Services has a difficult time getting students to register their bikes, Galitzer said.

"Since there aren't any penalties for not registering your bike, some students don't see the need to do it," he said. "We've had some bike fairs where students could register their bikes, but we haven't had a good response."

There are about 2,300 bikes registered with Parking Services.

"Part of the reason we are trying to implement the system of registering bikes over KATS is to increase the number registered," Abbott said.

Brian Lilley, junior in accounting, occasionally rides his bike on campus, but it is not registered.

"I plan on riding my bike more when the weather is nicer," he said. "I plan on registering it then."

Lilley said he doesn't think there is enough information available about how students can register their bikes, but hopes KATS will help with that problem.

"I think that any opportunity to protect your bike should be taken," he said. "People who are competitive in cycling, like myself, have a significant investment in our bikes and would want it recovered if it was stolen."

CATS

In addition to Dies' effort, seniors Ayome May and Chris Griffin came up big for the Cats, scoring 14 and 12 points, respectively, giving K-State three players scoring in double figures.

Nebraska's All-Big 12 candidate Venson Hamilton, who is seventh in the Big 12 in scoring and first in rebounding, poured in 15 points and grabbed 10 rebounds in the first half.

The senior center dwindled in the second half, however, and only contributed three points and three rebounds for the Cornhuskers.

"In the first half, he just came out tough," Dies said. "But in the second half, we doubled down and clogged the lane. That was the difference."

Cornhusker head coach Danny Nee attested to K-State's defensive effort and effective play against Hamilton.

"I thought K-State did a nice job of double-teaming Vincent Hamilton in the second half," Nee said. "When they took that option away from us, we couldn't score."

"All in all, the 17 points we scored in the second half is a credit to K-State's defense. They finally broke out and played normal and Nebraska struggled."

The first half started off with Hamilton taking charge. He poured in nine of the Huskers' first eleven points as Nebraska took an early 11-4 lead with 16:16 to go in the first half.

But with just under eleven minutes to go, Dies reeled off eight consecutive points to help the Wildcats go on a 12-2 run to take the lead 22-19 with seven minutes to go in the first half. Nebraska cut the lead on Louis Truscott's two free throws to end the half with a 28-28 tie.

Defense was the story in the second half for K-State as Nebraska only hit one field goal in the first six minutes of the half. With 8:05 remaining, the Wildcats combined defense with a huge 13-2 run and led by as many as 17.

"We showed how good of a team we can be defensively," senior forward Shawn Rhodes said. "It feels good. It was important for us to go out on the right track."

"We have a lot of momentum from these last two games and we've just got to keep it going."

May and Griffin scored in double figures as well, with 14 and 12 points, respectively.

Heidrick got his first start of his two-year career at K-State when Griffin and Rhodes approached Asbury at the beginning of the week and asked to be benched so that Heidrick could start the last home game of his career.

"They both came to me independent of each other," Asbury said. "I didn't say anything to either one of them. Shawn came to me first and said, 'Coach, I've been starting for three years, and I'd love for Heidrick to start a game.' I said, 'Well Shawn, that's interesting because I kind of wondered and was kind of hopeful that somebody would do that.'"

"I was just going to let it happen, and hopefully it would've happened and then Griffin did the exact same thing."

Asbury said the loss of this senior class has been an emotional time for him as a coach.

"These guys are great kids and Paco had been with me everyday since I've been here," Asbury said. "Yeah, it's very emotional."

60 teams from around the world are entered in the race this year.

"You see various kinds of dogs on the Iditarod, but they're all tough as nails," Duncan said.

The two said they plan to take side trips after the race starts. Traveling to Inubik, Alaska, which is past the Arctic Circle, will add more than 1,000 miles.

"I think what got me really wanting to go again this time was when I saw an article talking about a road that is completely ice that leads out of Inubik to the Arctic Ocean," Duncan said. "It's 100-percent ice."

more people involved in the marketing.

She said from the small amount research they have done, they have found people don't go to the games because they don't know it's free, and they don't have time.

"I think it's very important to support the different organizations and programs on campus. The thing I think should drive people to come is because it's exciting — it's basketball," Thomas said.

Another effort to increase awareness of the women's team is Adopt-A-Player. With this program, sororities can adopt a player, make good luck items for her and coordinate events together.

"I think the players like it. It gives them a chance to see what college is like not being a student athlete, and it is always great to know there are people in the crowd cheering and supporting you," said Kellie McClellan, Panhellenic Council director for public relations.

She said many sorority members were athletes in high school and understand the pressure on female athletes.

"I think Adopt-A-Player benefits the women's basketball team by letting the players know the sororities support them and are proud of their representation of K-State," McClellan said.

"A laboratory is a laboratory," Richardson said. "The idea is just to be able to continue doing good science."

Galitzer said while that may be the case, it is necessary to take every precaution to eliminate any hint of danger, although complete safety can never be certain.

"There's no guarantees," Galitzer said. "Not anywhere, at any time."

Senate approves 3 privilege-fee increases

By CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a week of inaction on pending legislation, Student Senate passed eight bills Thursday, including three increases in student privilege fees.

Final action took place on two bills allocating money to KSDB 91.9-FM. The privilege fee reserves account will be used to assist payment on the radio station's debt. The bulk of the debt was incurred from last year's Springfest '98. Other legislation regarding the station involved increasing the amount KSDB receives from privilege fees. Both bills were passed.

The Senate bill, which would make a one-time allocation of $29,825 to KSDB, passed 30-14. The bill was referred to the Privilege Fee Committee two weeks ago and was held over until Thursday's meeting.

Engineering Senator Crystal Campbell said she was afraid that by passing the bill, all privilege fee organizations would get the impression that if they went into debt, they could get money from students and Senate.

Arts and Sciences Senator Chris Crowder said he talked to students on campus and showed them a copy of the internal audit. He said the students he talked to felt it was not their problem to bail the radio station out of a problem it created by itself.

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism, said he agreed.

"These things should not have been possible. Students' fee money should not be spent this way, and it will not be again in the future," he said.

Simon said in the future not so much as an ink pen will be purchased without permission.

Internal Audit Director Warren Strauss said the auditors' overall opinion was that university policy was not followed. He said there was a lack of internal controls and management.

Strauss said it is up to police and the attorney to determine if there was any criminal action in the creation of a debt after incurring losses from Springfest '98 and other mismanagement of funds. Strauss has conferred with them already.

"Most of the items in the report are poor-management decisions. Poor-management decisions are not a criminal offense," he said.

After long debate, Senate also passed a bill to increase the radio station's privilege fee from $35,056 to $42,676. The increases will be used for the sole purpose of increasing the salary of the station manager.

The bill was amended in Senate from $50,296 per year to $42,676. The bill would only allocate the money for the next fiscal year, allowing Senate to

Senate supports tuition hike for library

By DANICA COTO
AND CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A unanimous-consent vote by Student Senate on Thursday could be the first step to increasing tuition $1 per credit hour, the proceeds of which would benefit Hale Library.

"Plain and simple, I think this is the best way to go," Student Senate Vice Chair Jake Worcester said.

With approval from the Kansas Board of Regents and the Kansas Legislature, tuition would be increased $1 per credit hour for students who are residents and increased

1.4 percent for non-resident students, Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said Thursday.

This proposal would be for academic year 2000-01 and applied to the current cost of $69 per credit hour. No further increases are foreseen.

"We would view this as a one-time adjustment in our tuition schedule," Rawson said.

The increase would generate nearly $600,000 a year that would be used to help fund the library. This would be added to the revenues from research

Texas killer gets death

By MICHAEL GRACZYK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JASPER, Texas — Smirking and cursing his victim's family as he was led away, white supremacist John William King was sentenced to death Thursday for chaining a black man to a pickup truck and dragging him to pieces.

Eleven white jurors and their elected black foreman took less than three hours to sentence King to lethal injection rather than life in prison, taking about the same amount of time they needed to convict him Tuesday of murdering James Byrd Jr. in one of the grisliest racial crimes since the civil rights era.

King becomes the first white sent to death row in Texas for killing a black person since capital punishment resumed in the 1970s. Texas has executed only one white person for killing a black person — in 1854.

Byrd's relatives wiped their eyes after hearing the death sentence but declined Judge Joe Bob Golden's offer to say something to King.

Byrd's nephew Darrell Verrett held up his fingers in a V sign and said, "Everything's OK." On the courthouse lawn, women high-fived each other and exclaimed, "Justice is served!"

"For once, I'm proud to be from Jasper; for once, justice has been served in Jasper," said Ethel Parks, a black woman wearing a T-shirt with a picture of Byrd beneath the words, "Love, Peace and Harmony."

Spectators taunted King, yelling "Bye, bye, King!" as he was led from the courthouse.

When asked if he had anything to say to Byrd's family, King said "Yeah" and muttered an obscenity.

"I wouldn't expect for him to say 'God bless the Byrd family,'" Byrd's sister Mary Verrett said. "It just sums up the total personality of this young man. He has no remorse, even in the face of death."

Through his attorney, King released a statement saying: "Though I remain adamant about my

Miss America Coed 1999 fulfills duties as pageant winner, K-State freshman

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It used to be all about beauty — who had the thinnest body, the biggest smile and the prettiest face. But pageants nowadays look beyond the beauty to find the brains.

"They're looking for the inner beauty, not the outer beauty," Andrea Ediger, freshman in biology, said.

Ediger was crowned Miss American Coed for 1999, and she also won Miss Photogenic 1999. The Hilton Hotel at Walt Disney World in Orlando, Fla., teamed with pageant contestants who hoped to win the crown this past Thanksgiving.

Ediger said there were no men participating, and the word "coed" was used simply to convey an All-American name. The contestants were not only competing for the "All-American girl" title but also for a $2,500 academic scholarship.

"Everybody was very sincere," Ediger said. "It's a family-run pageant. That's what sets it apart from the others."

Ediger was first runner-up for Miss Kansas Teen and later was crowned Miss Kansas American Coed, which allowed her to qualify for the national title.

She started modeling in seventh grade to save money for the future.

"I was hoping to start saving up for college," Ediger said. "I was real young, and I wasn't too sure about it."

Supported by her parents, Ediger entered the pageant. She said the contestants got to know each other while waiting in line for rides at Disney World. A national panel judged contestants in three categories: talent, speech and photogenic appearance. She won Miss Photogenic 1999.

"I used to be really shy. But the more I did it, the more comfortable I was," Ediger said.

Her biggest event was Sunday — the day of the competition, the crowning and the coronation banquet.

"My goal was to make the top 15. I never expected that to happen," Ediger said. "I was hoping to just walk to the front of the stage and not faint. It went like a flash."

The judges based their decisions on a contestant's character, poise, appearance, personality and talent. Ediger's talent was playing the piano. She performed a song she and her jazz instructor wrote. She said some of the more interesting contestant talents were Tae Kwon Do, and harp playing.

Ediger not only was a contestant at the pageant but also a judge for the competition of girls ages 5-8. She said it was good to compete and judge, because she learned a lot.

"I've learned to just have fun. When you do, there's a certain glow, and the judges see that," Ediger said.

Ediger said she will use some of the scholarship money in the coming months to travel to New York and Alaska.

"I want to go to New York because it looks so exciting, and Alaska, well, I've just never been there," Ediger said.

Before traveling, Ediger has to address her Miss American Coed responsibilities. Atop her list is visiting state pageants and judging optional contests during the weekends May through November. She

KDOT awards money for path construction

By ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction will begin on a new bike path in spring 2000 because of a $464,000 allocation from the Kansas Department of Transportation.

The projected location of the bike path will be on Manhattan Avenue, from Clafin Road to Anderson Avenue.

According to the transportation-enhancement program, the project will provide improved safety for bicycle riders or pedestrians, expand alternative modes of transportation, expand recreational opportunities and enhance the scenic qualities of the corridor.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, submitted his proposal last September. The proposal is Phase II of City/University Bicycle Master Plan. Phase I of the Master Plan has an existing path running east and west on Kimball Avenue.

"The proposed path will complete the gap that is in front of the Rec on Kimball, and it will then continue to Manhattan Avenue," Taussig said.

KDOT will provide 80 percent of the funding, Taussig said. The other 20 percent will come from the city, city/university funds and KSU Foundation, he said.

Darwin Abbott, parking-services director, said his office would provide racks for the bicycles using the new path.

There will be landscaping that includes trees, native shrubs and wild flowers. The city also will install 15 additional street lights to provide a safer atmosphere.

Taussig said the benefits of the new path not only will affect about 5,000 K-State students living in the vicinity but also local residents.

"The benefits we see is for the student population, faculty and staff that live up here now, to use it just for commuting purposes," he said. "But I see a big benefit being that people are going to use the recreational path because they are wanting to get out, walk and ride bikes."

The path also will be useful for the residents of Bluehills subdivision and Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community.

"Those having an access to the path can now walk to the games, to City Park, or to Aggieville," Taussig said. "It will become a safety feature as an alternative to using the street."

Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said the new bike path will provide a safe means for pedestrian and bicycle travel. But he said it also will give a new mode of transportation for Flint Hills public housing, which is designated for low-income families.

"A lot of those living in this area do not have cars," Fehr said. "This new path would give pedestrians a way to travel to places, and they won't have to walk on the street."

He said the primary benefit would be for the adjacent neighborhood, which has no sidewalks.

"We need to look at this as a community benefit and not what it's going to do for K-State," Taussig said. "It is not just a K-State project but a community project."

Interfraternity Council honored as Midwest's best

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the K-State greek system left a Chicago conference with several awards, including one that ranks the Interfraternity Council the best fraternity governing board in the Midwest.

The IFC received awards in seven of eight categories, and the Panhellenic Council, the sorority governing board, received awards in all eight categories at the Mid-American Greek Council Association. The conference, which was Feb. 18-21, brought together greek organizations from 17 Midwestern states.

"Both IFC and Panhell put applications together for eight awards," Cade Keenan, IFC president, said. "We had a lot of documentation for them."

Nearly 150 universities attended the conference, although not all applied for the awards. Of the nearly 200 awards given, K-State left with 15.

Greek Affairs adviser Barb Robel said the university's anti-hazing policy, anti-substance policy and Greek 101 program contributed to K-State's success. She said K-State's performance at the conference demonstrates the university's strong greek system.

"It's kind of a validation of the things we're doing," she said. "It's evidence that the programs and services of IFC and the Panhellenic Council are on the cutting edge."

The IFC won the Jellison award, which is awarded to one fraternity governing organization. Since the four years the Mid-American Greek Council Association has been in existence, K-State has won the award twice.

Keenan said IFC members compiled several documents to send to the organization.

"We gave them four 3-inch binders," he said. "It was a tremendous amount of information ets for concerts, sports and other events in the Midwest.

"We got the outlet as a service to the students," Craig Johnson, Union operations manager, said.

TicketMaster chose the Union to be the location of its outlet.

"I received a call from TicketMaster, and they were looking for an outlet," Kay Farley, assistant director of the bookstore, said.

Bringing an outlet to the location has been in the works for the past two years but required negotiations before a deal was made.

The Union Bookstore will not profit from the addition.

"We get a percentage of a service charge. So, we do get some reimbursement for all of the expenses of labor and other things," Johnson said.

Though tickets for events as far away as Chicago or Minneapolis, Minn., are available, the focus of the outlet will be local markets. Country Stampede tickets will be sold through the outlet.

"We have access to Kansas City Royals tickets, the Topeka Scarecrows hockey team, and a wide variety of other sporting events," Johnson said.

The outlet will not take phone calls. Sales are made in person at the desk.

"We are a walk-in-only service," Johnson said. "We are not set up to take phone calls, but there is a phone number they can call in Topeka if they need some more information."

All sales will be on a cash basis.

"We are cash only, but we are in last stages of finalizing credit cards," Johnson said. "So we will be able to take Visa and MasterCard, eventually. That should be finalized within a week."

The outlet is open during the Union Bookstore's business hours.

Residence hall association sponsors annual Winterball

This weekend, K-State residence hall students can don their Sunday best and be prepared for a night of dancing.

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls is sponsoring its annual Winterball, to take place at the Wareham Opera House at 8 p.m. Saturday.

The event will feature a live disc jockey and a photographer to take pictures of those in attendance.

— Seth Trotter

The event, which is free and open to any students living in the residence halls, drew about 800 people last year, said Marc Maddox, ARH Social Programming Coordinator and sophomore in biology.

"This year, we're looking for a similar number or greater, if possible," he said. "Winterball is designed to be our event for people to dress up, go dancing and have a good time."

Nick Lander, ARH president and sophomore in statistics, said he saw the event as an alternative to other weekend activities.

"It will give residence hall students a chance to get away from the typical weekend and give them a chance to enjoy themselves."

For more information about Winterball, contact the KSUARH office, located in the basement of Putnam Hall, at 395-6431.

Senate passes bill to limit power of state 'water czar'

TOPEKA — The state's "water czar" — who holds great sway over how farmers and ranchers can use water — would have some of his power diluted under a bill passed Thursday by the Senate.

The 30-9 vote sent the measure to the House.

"The problem is we have a judge, jury and executioner in one person, and it's expensive for small farmers to go to court. It's too much power concentrated in one individual," Sen. Larry Salmans, R-Hanston, said.

At issue is the role of the chief engineer of the Division of Water Resources, which is part of the Department of Agriculture.

The chief engineer, now David Pope, has independent regulation authority over many areas regarding water, including processing water-use applications.

The chief engineer's approval power extends to water use for such things as irrigation, livestock operations and the impoundment behind some dams.

The bill would require the secretary of agriculture to approve on any regulations proposed by the chief engineer. It also would allow people to appeal a decision by the chief engineer to a hearing officer rather than having to go to district court. The hearing officer's decision would be reviewed by the agriculture secretary.

— Seth Trotter

— Seth Trotter

Sen. Paul Feleciano, R-Wichita, said the Senate was moving too quickly on the measure and "we could end up politicizing water rights."

Others felt differently. Sen. Tim Huelskamp, R-Fowler, said, "It's high time the chief engineer be put in the same line as all the other bureaucrats. If you have this much power in one person, you have the potential for favoritism."

Environmentalists have expressed concern over giving the secretary of agriculture veto power because they said they believe the department can be biased toward agricultural interests over environmental interests.

Missouri police injured by escaped prisoners' gunfire

HUNTSVILLE, Mo. — Two men on the run after escaping from a Georgia prison wounded five Missouri law-enforcement officers in a shootout Thursday before waving a white flag, and surrendering.

Two police officers from the nearby town of Moberly were wounded seriously and two others had less serious injuries after the shooting at a trailer home. A Randolph County sheriff's deputy suffered an arm injury but did not go to the hospital.

One of the prison escapees was treated for a shoulder wound and released back into custody.

Gunfire erupted from the back of the trailer home as the officers approached it at 6 a.m., about 45 minutes after firing tear gas. The tear gas was fired into the trailer after officers found the two men inside had blocked off the front door.

The tear gas did not work as intended, Moberly Police Chief Mike Garbalski said. "The gas should have put them out (of the trailer)," he said.

The shooting continued for about 25 minutes until one of the escapees waved the white flag and threw out the shotgun, Randolph County authorities said.

Taken by helicopter to the University of Missouri hospital in Columbia were Officer Charles Tarr and Detective Tim Luntsford. Officers Troy Link and Mark Ansperger were taken to Moberly Regional Hospital.

Randolph County Chief Deputy Mark Nichols decided to seek his own treatment for his arm injury.

The owner of the trailer home, Doris Twyman, said she had rented it to a woman and her two children. The woman had recently had a baby and was away staying with relatives, Twyman said.

"They have it all roped off, but you could see big holes in it," Twyman said of the heavily damaged trailer.

Moberly police had received a tip about 1 a.m. that the escapees might be at the trailer. There had been reports that they were in Jefferson City and Columbia over the weekend.

Monday is deadline for financial-aid paperwork

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
AND MOLLY MERSMANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who need money for next year need to ask for it by Monday. The priority deadline to mail the Free Application for Federal Student Aid is March 1.

"This is pretty much your main form," said Jaret Wohler, Office of Student Financial Assistance employee and senior in agribusiness. "If you want to get financial aid, as far as loans go, you have to get that filled out. So it's really important."

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said in order to get loans, grants or work study, students must submit the FAFSA.

"I would get it in right away," Moeder said.

MORE INFO?

Applications are available in Fairchild 104. The World Wide Web address of the Free Application For Federal Student Aid Web site is www.fafsa.ed.gov. For more information call the Office of Student Financial Assistance 532-6420.

"It's due Monday, so they basically have the weekend to work with parents and get it filled out."

Federal programs focus on students with financial need. Students can apply by mail.

"The application is the cornerstone to all federal programs," Jack Taylor, assistant director at student financial and starts the verification process. Students will then be asked to provide a copy of tax returns and a W-2.

Three to four weeks after the application has been sent, applicants will receive a student aid report, which is based on a federal formula. The formula compares the resource amount with the cost of attending school.

"I simply advise every student to apply for federal assistance and let the state determine where they stand in the process," Moeder said.

Seventy percent of all K-State students receive some type of financial assistance.

Of all the possibilities for students to get financial aid, government programs have several advantages, Moeder said.

At a five percent interest rate, the Federal Perkins Loan has the lowest rate of all loan programs.

"The Federal Perkins Loan is especially interesting for potential teachers," Taylor said. "If they get hired as teachers in areas like science and mathematics, the state will absorb a portion of their loan every year."

Undergraduate students with an exceptional financial need may get a federal grant. Accepted applicants receive $400 to $3,000 per year that does not have to be paid back.

Application for the Federal College Work-Study program is included in the FAFSA. Under the program, the state pays 75 percent for each individual applying for a job on campus.

The Federal College Work-Study makes students more attractive for K-State employers, Moeder said.

The nice thing about the program is that students do not have to worry about paying the money back, said Jean Darbyshire, director of administration services at Hale Library.

"We always encourage students to identify Federal College-Work aid," Darbyshire said. "It is an excellent program and of course, it helps us, too."

assistance, said.

Three to four weeks after the application has been sent, applicants will receive a student aid report, which is based on a federal formula. The formula compares the resource amount with the cost of attending school. The age of the parents, the number of students in the family, family size, income, taxes and asset values have a part to play in this comparison, Moeder said.

Chris Masters, (right) junior in management information systems, and Chris McCarthy, junior in physical anthropology, announce their candidacy for student body president and vice president Thursday afternoon in the free-speech zone outside the K-State Student Union.

Masters, McCarthy announce platform

By GINNY WRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student concerns that have gone unresolved are the main focus of running mates Chris Masters and Chris McCarthy.

Masters, junior in business management and information systems, and McCarthy, junior in physical anthropology, announced their candidacy Thursday in the free-speech zone, north of the K-State Student Union.

They said they have based their platform on the student issues that still have not been addressed.

"Parking has always been a major concern," McCarthy said, as he stood beside Masters to announce their candidacy. "We also want to try getting some useful information in Hale Library. Privilege Fees are also a major topic, and we want to let students have a say in where their money goes."

Masters said he and McCarthy are not running for their own personal gain but to help out students who don't have much of a voice.

"I don't want this as a personal accomplishment or some line on a résumé, as necessarily as I want to help out," Masters said.

Masters said he felt as if he had been represented unfairly in the past and wishes to change that for future students.

"I don't feel that I've been represented totally," Masters said. "I have never had a president or a senator or anybody ever come up to me in the four years I've been here. I think maybe that's something I would like to try."

Masters and McCarthy said they especially want to reach out to the freshman students. They said neither of them ever had been approached by anyone their freshman year. They said approaching freshman would help them to not be so lost and afraid during their freshman year.

Masters and McCarthy said through talking to students and listening to their problems and concerns, they plan to be better representatives.

"We want to represent students the best we can," Masters said. "We hope to make a change and represent students."

Masters and McCarthy said they are just trying to help everyone the best they can and give something back. They said if they win they want to get as much done as they can.

"We want to help ourselves, help our friends and help the rest of the student body by taking care of these issues," Masters said. "It's a big deal."

Increased filings show interest in leadership

The campus community is speculating on what caused a dramatic increase in the number of students who filed for Student Governing Association elections.

The more than 200 candidates who filed for various positions constitute the most filings in the last five years. Most colleges doubled the number of candidates running for Senate.

Some students undoubtedly thought the best way to make changes was to take leadership positions. SGA obviously did a good job of recruiting and explaining the election process to students.

No matter what the reason was, one thing is for sure — it's about time.

Each of the students who chose to run for SGA should be commended for wanting to represent his or her university. Although many of them will not leave the process with a campaign victory, the sheer number of candidates is breath of fresh air to what had become a trend of dismal elections.

Previous elections left plenty of room for write-in candidates to win. This year's filing helps to assure that every seat is filled by someone who was motivated and committed enough actually to campaign for that position.

Another positive aspect of the number of candidates is that having a name on a ballot will no longer guarantee a win. Students running for office will have their work cut out for them to get elected. Competition brings out the best in people, and it's never more important than in elections.

Students should be excited about the future of SGA. New members will bring new ideas, new agendas and new solutions.

A MODEST PROPOSAL

Compromise would solve debate over concealed weapons

Once again, the state legislators in Topeka are debating whether it should be legal for state citizens to be able to carry concealed handguns. The last I heard was that the House Federal and State Affairs Committee voted 15-6 to send the measure to the House for a debate and a vote.

Proponents of this bill argue that because citizens do have the U.S. constitutional right to bear arms, individuals with an acutely high sense of paranoia legally should be able to find some level of false emotional security by carrying a firearm or two, provided that they have no previous felony convictions and have no history of alcohol or drug abuse nor mental illness in the past five years.

Personally, I see these stipulations as setting up a catch-22 situation. I mean how could one develop this level of paranoia unless the individual in question had a mental illness stemming from drug and alcohol abuse?

This is no more perfectly exemplified than by the journalist Hunter S. Thomson. It's bad enough this guy possesses an arsenal as it is. Do we really want a nut like Thomson legally running around with concealed weapons? (I guess it is not like he doesn't do this anyway.)

Besides the fact that one has to be a few cans short of a six-pack to feel the compulsion to carry a hidden handgun, opponents to this bill argue that we don't want to live in a society where no one knows whether the individuals about us are armed or not.

I have two young children. I don't want someone whom I invite into my house to be carrying a concealed firearm unbeknownst to me. Would anyone, except for the people possessing the hidden guns, actually feel safer not knowing whether the people we encounter in the super market, in the movie theater, in class or in the bars are armed or not?

Most police officers are against this bill. Lots of encounters between officers of the law and the public are stressful enough. Now add into this equation a concealed gun. Being a police officer is a dangerous occupation. Think about how much more anxious police officers would be if they had to deal with a citizenry who could carry hidden firearms legally.

We should be wanting to help our police friends do their job, not making it more difficult. Besides, if the police are more jumpy, the likelihood of innocent individuals accidentally getting shot by the police will increase.

The reason why people would feel like they needed the protection from a concealed weapon is to protect themselves from the roving element. Opponents argue that if one was accosted by this roving element, chances are the bad guy has gotten the drop on the good guy. Thus, even if the good guy had a concealed gun, the good guy probably won't even have the opportunity to even get the gun out. The bad guy not only gets the good guy's wallet, rings and pocket watch, but the gun too. Now the bad guy has a new toy to play with that might be used against the original owner of the gun.

Both the opponents and proponents to this bill present persuasive reasons which support their side of the debate. However, there is a compromise position that will allow individuals to be able to carry their firearms yet also address the concerns of having people running about with concealed weapons. There needs to be an exposed gun law.

Under an exposed gun law there is no need to worry about who about us might be armed. We can see right away who has a gun and who doesn't. If someone comes to my door, I won't have to ask the awkward question, "Are you packing?" I'll be able to see right away who has a gun and who does not. If they are a carrier, I then can tell this person to check their gun at the door.

This also will hold true when we're out in public. If we choose not to be next to the kid with the gun, we can sit somewhere else in the classroom.

Just like there are smoking and non-smoking sections of restaurants, there can be armed and unarmed sections. This could not occur under a concealed gun law.

An exposed gun law also would be easier on the nerves of the police. When they have an encounter with the citizenry, they'll be able to see if the person they're harassing is armed and thus be able to take the appropriate cautionary action.

The reason why anyone would want to carry a gun is so some recourse can be taken if one is attacked, but no one wants to be attacked in the first place. Moreover, if one was attacked, no one wants a shoot-out in the streets. The exposed gun law would prevent all this. Just carrying an exposed gun will be a deterrent to crime. Even a complete idiot would know better than to attack an armed person over an unarmed person. If you're not attacked in the first place, then there is no need to worry about shoot-outs in the street.

With an exposed gun law, even if you had an aversion to possessing a firearm, you could carry around a fake gun. Evil-doers won't know the difference, and you would be offered the same level of protection.

Also, if there are enough people running around in the streets with their guns showing, the workers of ill will be too afraid to practice their craft. No hoodlum would dare holdup the liquor store if the other patrons are showing guns. Would we not all feel safer when out in public seeing our fellow citizens with their weapons and knowing that no criminal would be stupid enough to attack anyone?

Finally, if it ever came down to a shoot-out, it's a hell of a lot quicker to draw the exposed gun than to try to dig around in one's pocketbook or coat pocket in an attempt to get to the weapon.

An exposed gun law well could solve all our criminal problems. If you're going to carry a gun, you might as well flaunt it.

Stereotypes of greek system disappear after one becomes part of organization

VIEWPOINT

BECKY GUTHRIE

I grew up wanting nothing to do with the greek system. I hated the stereotypes. I was never a cheerleader, never a star athlete and certainly never considered boys to be the object of my life.

Yet I'm in the greek system now. Something changed. I gave the system a chance.

All of those stereotypes floating around campuses nowadays once might have been ubiquitously true, but times change and so has the greek system. Becky Guthrie is living proof of that.

I'm proud to be a member of my house.

Academics always have come first. Members are even put on social probation if they fail to meet the high standards of excellence the house has established. Social functions don't come first.

Accusations have been made that we, the greek system, try to cover hazing and other negative activities with "brags" about philanthropic events, and accusations that students on this campus should search for other avenues to complete community service. Personally, I am or have been involved with more than 10 organizations independent of the greek system that are devoted entirely to community service. I am not alone. Greeks are some of the most involved on campus.

Complaints have been made about wanting freshmen so that the sorority or fraternity can brainwash the new members. Whatever. I went through rush as an upperclassman, and it was difficult. No doubt about that. Yes, houses cut sophomores and juniors based entirely on age. It's a fact. Move on. Potential employers sometimes don't hire a person because of his or her age (unofficially, of course).

A sorority or fraternity is much like a business. A lot of time and effort is invested to make it the best organization it can be. Businesses don't hire 60-year-olds to a promotion-based position because by the time the new employee learns all the ropes, he or she is probably going to retire. Where does the leadership come from then? Same with a sorority. If all sophomores and juniors are pledged, then when four years come around ("senior year"), none of those new pledges will be in the house anymore. The house will lack the senior leadership it desperately needs to survive.

As for the selection of these members, rush is called rush for a reason. It's one week of going from 11 sororities to one sorority. It would be nice if the members of the house and the rushees could become thoroughly acquainted with each other. It takes me at least a semester to get to know someone that well, much less 50 girls. I just don't have that kind of time; nobody does — you know, that pesky thing called school gets in the way.

Even the sorority rush system offers more of an opportunity to get to know each other than job interviews do. Interviews take a look at a resume (as do sororities) and conduct two, maybe three interviews. Before the "mutual selection process" of rush is completed, each narrowed-down house and narrowed-down rushee meet four times.

Hopefully by then you have chosen a house or girl that you're compatible with. Please note the aforementioned term: mutual selection process. It's not just a system that looks good on paper. That's what rush is all about — you cut, they cut. Your friends are not chosen for you. You are an integral part in choosing your friends.

So now comes the issue of stereotyping individual houses. To a certain degree, yes, houses have a certain character about them. A 4.0 grade point average student is not likely to choose a house that focuses primarily on social events. Nor is a girl primarily focused on meeting and dating boys going to opt for a house whose main interest lies with studying. That's why there are 11 sororities running the gamut on personalities. That's why there's rush.

I have met some (but by far, not all) of my dearest friends through my house. As a senior, I have evaluated my college career, including my membership in a sorority, whether I would do it all over again. I would do it all over again without a second thought because I have learned so much about patience, caring, teamwork and dedication through my sisters.

The greek system isn't for everyone. Take it from someone who used to hold those copious stereotypes — don't knock it 'til you've tried it.

I was wondering: When you print something about Tracey Mann, instead of doing only a head shot, if we could have a full body shot.

I was just wondering: If KSDB is in such a big debt right now all because they booked Tone Loc, why are they still playing it on the radio, if their listeners wouldn't even come out and support the urban music?

Why is the Rec open longer than the library?

Let's move basketball back to Ahearn and shuttle fans in from the Bramlage purple palace parking garage.

I think as long as the campus privilege fees are paying the Rec officials' wages, it's our privilege to cuss and yell at them.

One question: How do you have greek housing in America?

I resent the comment about the greek system that was printed on Tuesday. We don't rent friends, we pay good money to buy them.

I think the student radio station needs special prosecutor Ken Starr's touch here.

How is disliking the entire greek system based on the actions of a few members any different than disliking minorities based on the actions of a few, which is called racism?

I would like to thank the blond lady in the white Escort who stole my parking space in Durland. I missed my class.

Danetri Thompson's column about the greek system is way off base. How can she even know what it's like if she hasn't even been through it?

Way to go, Danetri Thompson. It's about time someone put the facts and figures of the greek system on paper.

If the Kansas State Collegian is going to let people like Danetri Thompson write column for it, maybe we shouldn't have a school paper.

I'm a student at Manhattan High School, and I was reading the Collegian and I saw this article about how greeks enjoy hazing and stuff like that. The only reason I think Danetri Thompson has so much free time to write articles like that is because she got kicked out of rush after the first day.

Hey, Danetri Thompson, it's nice to see you've watched "Animal House." Why don't you try stepping out of your dorm room and see who runs this university.

Miss Thompson's argument might be relevant if greek rush was mandatory, but you have to realize rush is strictly voluntary. I will shout until the day I die, "I'm proud to be a K-State greek."

Next time an independent column writer gets bored, try writing about something you actually know something about.

Insignificant people should not write insignificant articles.

Why do some writers of the Collegian feel it's necessary to bash the greek system? We don't sit around our houses and bash you.

I wanted to make a statement about residence halls. The price is going up but the standard of living here is going down or staying the same. Something really needs to be done about it.

I'd rather be a geek than a greek.

Tom Grimes makes me dissatisfied. He still uses "ain't" as a word.

A big thank you to Ken Wells for his heart-warming item in Monday's Collegian.

I think if all the independent people and all the greek people got together and watched "Oprah," we'd all get along.

The Gongfarmers, and especially L-Dopa, are infinitely better than the half-baked, pathetic attempt at humor that Conspiracy Theory offers.

Everyone is saying Asbury is the reason for a bad season. He's not. The reason we're losing is because our best motivational player is gone. Yes, he's the one and only Pero Vasiljevic. Without him, we stink.

To the drunks who passed through my yard on the way home from Aggieville, I think it's sad and pathetic and indicative of your maturity level that you think it's fun to smash up a child's toys. Why don't you grow up?

Can we lay off the K-State basketball team? The players and the coaches are doing their best, and I don't see any of you out there giving it your all.

Thank you, Danetri.

Miss Thompson, the tradition of excellence that follows the greek system of K-State is one that greeks and non-greeks can take pride in. This is not a tradition that is outmoded, and one should take caution before requesting it to be abandoned.

I'd like to inform Miss Thompson that I lived in Boyd Hall last year and we also had study files.

Voting best way to have government reflect society

Editor,

Mary VanLeeuwen's column, "Two-party system of government not a true reflection of today's society" is aptly titled. VanLeeuwen even states the reason for this problem, "First of all, everyone knows that the majority of Americans don't vote. No one votes, and therefore, our government is not a reflection of the views of the American people."

The problem with this statement is that it occurs in the middle of the piece. Instead she begins with, "We are not a government of the people. We are a government of dirty politics that does not reflect upon the people of this country." The result of the U.S. Senate impeachment trial was a reflection of the polls that stated President Clinton should not be found guilty and removed from office. That seems a direct reflection of the "wants of society."

VanLeeuwen continues to complain about our government in the context that it does not reflect the will of the people and needs to be thrown completely out. Why? She gave each of us the answer — to vote. Instead, VanLeeuwen wishes to lay complete blame on those elected. A member of the U.S. House of Representatives represents approximately 625,000 people and serves a 2-year term. That means if our representative listened to each constituent, we would be allotted 101 seconds if the representative went 24 hours a day the entire term without any break. How are our elected officials to do any work if they only sit and listen to each and everyone of us? The answer is, they cannot. For this reason, people of like minds and interests need to band together to promote their ideas.

We, as a society, have not lost our political way. The majority of our society has given up. If we truly want our government to reflect the society it represents, then we, as citizens, must step forward and do what is not only a right but a duty. We must vote, become aware and active in the goings-on in government at all levels. Nothing in life is easy. It is not easy to be a true citizen of this country. It is only easy if you do not participate.

Reader upset by 'tired and typical' greek stereotypes

Editor,

The greek system promotes stereotypes? What about the Collegian's columnists? In her opening paragraph, Dandredi Thompson refers to the same tired stereotypes of the greek system as truth. Her column perpetuates stereotypes rather than providing a careful examination of the factual characteristics of the greek system.

Greeks buy their friends? Upon signing a house, students are selecting their living accommodations. The greek system is affordable: The cost is comparable to residence halls. The friendships grow as a result of shared experiences in close living quarters. This is true in any living situation. Furthermore, a sorority or fraternity is not a student's boundary of acceptable friendships. The greek system is representative of the K-State campus in economic and ethnic diversity. It consists of students from the same geographical locations and economic and ethnic backgrounds represented in approximately the same proportion as the student population.

Fall sorority rush is a difficult time to discover a rushee's true personality. However, it is incorrect to conclude that judgments are based on superficial aspects of the rushees. Rushees submit a résumé of interests, goals, activities, community service involvement, etc. An experienced rushee knows decisions result from the most extensive consideration of the rushee possible in the short time period.

The process isn't flawless, but it involves no interference with academic responsibilities in an acceptable amount of time. It also allows rushees to consider each sorority rather than make a decision based solely on prior knowledge or unfortunate stereotypes.

Greek members know that individual house stereotypes are just stereotypes. Each house has all types of people and personalities. Reasonable people don't judge others on their affiliation with a particular organization.

Thompson attributes the higher overall GPA of the greek system primarily to test files. However, academic resources provided by a greek house include computers, reference materials and tutors in an encouraging, personal environment. A minimum GPA requirement for participation and scholarships provide extra incentive for academic success.

The greek systems' focus on its philanthropic efforts is not an attempt to disregard other students involved in community service. The purpose of service is to improve others' quality of life, and greek houses contribute time and money to the community and to philanthropic organizations. With so much negative news media attention, it is necessary for greeks to emphasize the positive aspects.

Networking results from involvement in any organization or activity. The size of the greek system provides many networking opportunities. Networking is a resource for people to reinforce their qualifications by garnering confidence and opportunity.

Thompson's tired and typical stereotyping of the greek system serves little more purpose than to stir up controversy and resentment between greeks and non-greeks. The distinction is ridiculous and both parties have advantages and disadvantages. The Collegian should encourage mutual acceptance and understanding rather than continually allow meager criticism of one party.

Greek system has diversity; generalizations inaccurate

Editor,

I am writing in reference to Dandredi Thompson's column concerning the greek system. I want to address the gross generalizations and insults she hurled at fraternity and sorority members.

To begin with, I would like to say I enjoyed Thompson's column attacking the stereotyping of African-Americans concerning the "Jam the Box" radio show. She has done a complete 180 with her attack on the greek system and the stereotypes attached to it.

I take great offense to the statement that you meet people like yourself in every way. My house prides itself on diversity. Among the members of my house we have students from all colleges. We also have people from different ethnic backgrounds. Our fraternity was the first non-African-American fraternity at K-State to initiate an African-American. Our chapter adviser is an African-American. We have members from Korean, Italian, Mexican, Dutch, German and other backgrounds. To say that greek houses are filled with people who are exactly alike is a gross overstatement.

I also take personal offense at the remark about everyone belonging to the same economic category. This is a thinly veiled attempt to say that all greeks are affluent. This is simply not the case. My college is paid for mostly by scholarships that I earned. I work to pay my bills. Many other people in the greek system are in the same boat.

One final item that irks me about the column is the sentence about "Having archives of hundreds of tests certainly helps." If I'm not mistaken, the library has archives of hundreds of tests, many with answers that were provided by faculty. Any student with can go to the library and find tests for their subject.

Thompson should have researched more into the greek system before making broad sweeping statements about the nature of the system and its members. I think she may have found that the greek system is a group of people who chose to get involved to better themselves and those around them, while at the same time having fun.

Cats need Colorado win to stay 7th in Big 12

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

As the Big 12 Tournament and the NCAA Championships loom near, the K-State men's basketball team finds itself needing a road victory and is looking to keep its two-game winning streak alive when it takes on Colorado at 3 p.m. Saturday in Boulder, Colo.

K-State is coming off an emotional 62-45 thrashing of fifth-place Nebraska on senior night at Bramlage Coliseum, while Colorado has won three straight, including 78-68 win over Texas Tech in Lubbock.

Senior forward Manny Dies tied his season high of 19 points on Senior Night as two other seniors, Ayome May and Chris Griffin, chipped in 14 and 12 points, respectively.

"It was a very necessary win," head coach Tom Asbury said. "We wanted to win that game bad. And we needed it."

With the Wildcats forcing 21 turnovers and causing Nebraska to shoot only 32 percent from the field, Asbury said he wanted to take that defensive effort to Boulder on Saturday.

"We can't afford to take this game in any fashion, whether it's positive or negative," he said. "I'd like to bottle our defense up and take it with us."

The Cats again will look to keep Colorado from being effective from the field as the Wildcats are 16-1 when they hold their opponents to less than 40-percent field-goal percentage.

Going into the game against Colorado, K-State is 18-10 on the season and 7-8 in the conference. Colorado is right behind the Wildcats in Big 12 standings in eighth place with a 6-9 record in conference play and a 15-13 overall record.

The Wildcats will try to win a conference road game at Boulder, where the Buffaloes are 12-3 on the season. K-State has won only one conference road game this season when it beat Iowa State, 67-62, at Ames, Iowa on Feb. 6.

Before the victory at Iowa State, K-State had a six-game losing streak in Big 12 road games and managed to compile only a 2-21 record in Big 12 road play.

Senior forward Shawn Rhodes said he hopes the Cats can take their momentum from their two-game winning streak into Boulder.

"We have to take the momentum from our last two games," Rhodes said. "We just got to keep it going. Both were pretty good wins. Colorado is a very good team at home. Hopefully, we can take this on the road."

Colorado has four players scoring in double figures on the season. Senior guard Kenny Price paces the Buffaloes with 14.3 points a game. Tyron Manlove and Jaquay Walls average 11.8 and 10.7, respectively.

K-State has notched a seventh-seed bid in the Big 12, but Colorado is right behind the Wildcats and could tie the Cats for the seventh seed with a victory.

K-State will look to secure an NCAA Tournament bid as it will try to and win the Big 12 Tournament next week.

Griffin said the Wildcats will need a win to get much needed momentum going into the Big 12 Tournament.

"The team with the most momentum will most likely go on and win the whole tournament," he said.

Women's team faces Kansas after loss to Nebraska for final regular-season game the rollercoaster known as the K-State women's basketball regular season comes to a close Saturday against No. 22 Kansas.

K-State, 6-9 in conference play and 13-12 overall, will renew its Sunflower rivalry with Kansas, 11-4 in conference play and 21-7 overall, and will look to get revenge in the second game this season against the Jayhawks, who defeated K-State 66-45 on Jan. 21.

K-State is attempting to bounce back from a 71-61 loss against Nebraska.

K-State head coach Deb Patterson said that even though the team lost to the Cornhuskers, it still improved.

"I thought we played better and our team played very hard," Patterson said.

Patterson said the game against Nebraska the game came down to a couple of critical stretches in which the Cornhuskers were able to build a 14-point lead.

"In the first half, we played very well except for about 4 minutes in the first half," Patterson said. "From that point on we were in a position of having to work our way back into the ballgame."

In the second half, Patterson said the team suffered another time lapse where it failed to take advantage of opportunities.

"In the second half, we had a 3-minute period of time where we didn't convert," Patterson said. "Those two segments of time were very critical."

Junior center Angie Finkes returned to the line-up after missing two weeks with a leg injury. In just 17 minutes of play against Nebraska, Finkes scored 11 points and had six rebounds.

"I feel good about our ability to score with Finkes back on the floor," Patterson said.

Patterson said she expects Finkes to play about half the game.

"We are hopeful to get at least 20 minutes," Patterson said. "Anything more than that — I would be ecstatic."

Kansas enters the game after a overtime road victory against Oklahoma State. Lynn Pride scored 28 points and the Jayhawks overcame a 29-22 half-time deficit to win 79-72.

Patterson said Pride makes the rest of the Kansas players jobs a lot easier.

"It puts them in a position of not having to hurry," Patterson said. "Having an All-American makes them all better players."

From the top to bottom of the lineup, Patterson said the Jayhawks are a solid team.

"They really don't have a weakness — against a team like that you have to play rock solid," Patterson said.

The Cats are trying to get 10,000 fans to come to the game against Kansas, and assistant coach Sue Serafini said a large crowd for the game makes a difference.

"For players and coaches, a large crowd is one of those things that you can't really describe, it is just amazing," Serafini said.

"WE ARE HOPEFUL TO GET AT LEAST 20 MINUTES. ANYTHING MORE THAN THAT I WOULD BE ECSTATIC."

Cats test new lineup against Baylor

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Coming off of a week in which the K-State baseball team, 6-5 overall, won five straight contests at home, the Cats travel to Waco, Texas, today to face the No. 27 Baylor Bears in a three-game series that starts tonight and ends on Sunday.

Baylor will be the first Big 12 Conference opponent for K-State. In facing the Bears, 9-4, the Cats will compete against their toughest foe since K-State dropped all three games in a series with Clemson earlier in the year.

"They're a very solid ball club," head coach Mike Clark said. "They don't have a weak spot. When they do make a mistake, you have to take advantage of it."

Baylor junior pitcher/designated hitter Jason Jennings was a preseason All-America selection and enters the series with a 1-0 record from the mound with a 1.95 ERA while having struck out 32 batters in only 27 innings pitched. Opposing batters have compiled a microscopic .184 average against him.

From the plate, Jennings is hitting .326 with two home runs and sports an on-base percentage approaching .500.

"He has the potential to hit 20 home runs and he's probably the best pitcher in the conference," assistant coach Mike Hensley said.

"He's a tremendous talent and a great competitor, and every time we've seen him, he's given us fits."

In addition to Jennings, the Bears have outfielder Jon Topolski, who is also a preseason All-America selection. Topolski struggled at times early on in the season but has built his average up to .250 and is second on the team with three home runs and 10 RBIs.

As a team, the Bears .265 batting average ranks among the best in the Big 12. For the Cats, the starting rotation for the series will take on a new look.

Freshman pitcher/third baseman Brett Reid (1-0) will start his second game of the season over the course of the series, and senior Derek Andersen (1-2), will remain in the rotation.

The final spot will go to senior Brandon Peck (2-2) or junior Jason Wells (1-1), both incumbent starters.

"They both have things that they need to be doing better," Clark said. "We would like to see them both a little more in the strike zone."

"Both have the stuff to do it, both have done it at this level, but for whatever reason they've gotten off to slow starts."

From the plate, the Wildcats turned the offense up a notch for last week's home stand, scoring a total of 44 runs in those five contests.

"Our hitting is really starting to come together, we're starting to drive in a lot of runs," Reid said.

Clark said the reason for K-State's productive hitting has been confidence at the plate.

"The team is starting to get a lot of confidence in their swings," Clark said.

Attempting to bolster the team batting average will be senior outfielder/closer Andy Silva, who only had one plate appearance last week, a groundout to third base.

Clark said Silva recovered from an automobile accident almost four weeks faster than first thought and will see more time in the field against the Bears.

Junior third baseman Travis Andre' will see his first action of the year after being suspended for the first 11 games. He could be used in a variety of roles, including third base, first base, designated hitter or as a pinch hitter.

"He's a valuable bat — we'll just have to wait and see what his role will be," Clark said.

After the series with the Bears concludes on Sunday, the Cats will next be in action on March 5 against Western Michigan.

Track athletes look to qualify for tourney

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

There is one chance left for six K-State track-and-field athletes to qualify automatically for the NCAA Championships in Indianapolis. They will go to Iowa State's Cyclone National Qualifier this weekend.

Two other athletes, having already qualified, will travel to the U.S. Indoor National Championships in Atlanta.

Women's weight throwers Renetta Seiler and Anna Whitham, who took the top-two spots in the Big 12 in that event, automatically qualified for the NCAA. They will be competing in Atlanta to better prepare for the NCAA meet.

"Really, the main reason I think we have them go there is the setup — it's a large building just like Indianapolis, and the setup is very similar," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "I'm not too crazy about the idea of the travel, but from the competitive standpoint in terms of staying sharp, this is probably what's best for them."

The women's 1600-meter relay team, men's weight thrower Tamel Sisney, and 55-meter sprinter Aaron Lockett compete in the Cyclone National Qualifier this weekend.

Rovelto said this meet gives some athletes the chance to improve one last time, as Lockett and Sisney have qualified provisionally for the NCAA meet. "Aaron and Tamel are pretty much on the bubble as far as getting into the national meet. So maybe they can improve themselves, but also maybe they can stay sharp," Rovelto said.

The women's relay team has not qualified for the NCAA meet but wanted the opportunity to compete singly in that event, as opposed to at the end of a meet in which they already have competed in several events, as in the Big 12 Conference meet.

"The women's four-by-four never had an opportunity to run fresh," Rovelto said. "The nature of last-chance meets, there may or may not be much competition. I don't know if it's worth it or not, but we're going to let them run a race fresh."

"I don't know how likely it is that they'll qualify, I think that probably, given the girls that we have, although they're all running great for them, but they all have to run their best at the same time to have a shot at qualifying. How likely it is, I don't know, but they've all worked hard and deserve the chance to give it a shot."

After the USA Indoor Championships, K-State will travel to Indianapolis on March 5-6 for the NCAA Championships.

"AARON AND TAMEL ARE PRETTY MUCH ON THE BUBBLE AS FAR AS GETTING INTO THE NATIONAL MEET. MAYBE THEY CAN IMPROVE THEMSELVES, BUT ALSO MAYBE THEY CAN STAY SHARP."

Blue Valley Riders sponsor weekend motorcycle show

By BRIAN HERNANDEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Motorcycle enthusiasts from north and central Kansas will be converging in Manhattan this weekend to attend the 1999 Blue Valley Riders Motorcycle Show.

The show, in its sixth year, will be from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. Saturday and from noon to 6 p.m. Sunday at Manhattan Town Center. It is open to the public, and there is no admission charge.

Monty Prescott, co-chairman of the show committee, said he expects about 70 motorcycles to be on display during the weekend. The motorcycles will be displayed in the mall's courtyard and in the corridors lining the shops.

Prescott said the show allows cyclists and the public to interact.

"The main purpose of the show is for public enjoyment," Prescott said. "It also gives us a chance to visit with people and let them get to know about the club and motorcycles in general."

Trophies will be awarded in eight classes of motorcycles: antique, classic, sport touring, open street, competition, custom and scooters. The show's most popular motorcycle also will be awarded a trophy. The award ceremony will be at 5 p.m. Saturday in the mall courtyard.

Prescott said the show is presented each year in late winter because of the changing seasons.

"We have the show at this time of year because of the anticipation of spring fever," he said. "The owners enjoy displaying their bikes after not getting to ride them during the winter months."

The onset of warmer weather means the public should become more aware of motorcyclists on the road, Prescott said. That issue is one of major importance in the motorcycle community, he said.

"The show also allows us to discuss safety issues with the public," he said. "If they are aware there are motorcyclists on the road, then maybe more courtesy will be given to the riders out there."

The Blue Valley Riders Motorcycle Club was founded in the 1920s but died out a few years later because of lack of activity and interest. The club was renewed in 1987 after it was

School-district recruiters interview students

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

School-district representatives from Kansas and across the country will be on campus today to interview education students for job openings.

Fifty-nine districts from Nebraska, Missouri, Texas, New Mexico, Illinois, Iowa and Kansas are visiting K-State to interview about 250 prospective teachers.

"This is a great opportunity for the students to get initial contact with administration," said Tim Henderson, assistant director at Career and Employment Services.

Students went through a pre-selection process to prepare for the interviews. They had to submit their résumés to Career and Employment Services three weeks ago and sign up to request interviews with particular districts.

The résumés were sent to the school districts and evaluated, but not all students got the interviews of their choice.

The interviews provide both the representatives and the students with a chance to exchange information, Henderson said.

"A lot of times, résumés end up sitting in a pile with 200 other applicants," he said. "This way, students are able to market themselves face to face."

In the interviews, representatives will be looking primarily at experiences in block classes, student teaching and any opportunities students have had to work with kids. Representatives also are interested in leadership skills, classroom management and a student's philosophy of education, Henderson said.

"For my particular district, I want people who love kids," said Judy Tull, director of elementary personnel in the Kansas City, Kan., school district. "I also want people who feel confident with themselves as teachers."

Rachel Treaster, senior in elementary education, said "I deal one-on-one with kids with problems. If they don't understand, I can come up with different ways of approaching the same subject."

Students were advised to do research on the districts and encouraged to ask questions during the interviews as well.

The promotional opportunities as teachers, the support from the board and administration, the classroom size, the specifics in the curriculum and the philosophy of the school district all are important inquiries, Henderson said.

"Basically, with these interviews, I'll

"BASICALLY, WITH THESE INTERVIEWS, I'LL SEE WHAT DISTRICTS I'LL BE HAPPY IN. I DON'T KNOW WHERE I WANT TO WORK YET, AND THE INTERVIEWS PROVIDE US WITH A LOT OF CHOICES, MAKING IT EASIER."

— RACHEL TREASTER
SENIOR, ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

see what districts I'll be happy in," Treaster said. "I don't know where I want to work yet, and the interviews provide us with a lot of choices, making it easier."

Treaster will be interviewing with districts in four states.

"I want to get interviewing experience to get a better understanding of what employers are looking for," Erin Thomas, senior in elementary education, said.

Some students might walk away from interviews with job offers. Larger districts, which need a certain number of teachers, are more likely to make an offer right away, Henderson said.

With each year of interviews, a trend has developed, he said.

"We've had consistent comments that more districts love K-State education grads," Henderson said. "They are well-trained and prepared, and ready to hit the ground running."

Israel denies extradition of teen-ager

By RON KAMPEAS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court blocked the extradition Thursday of a U.S. teen-ager suspected in the grisly dismemberment of an acquaintance, a move that threatened to revive a strain on U.S.-Israel relations.

The reluctant tones of the judges' 3-2 decision keeping Samuel Sheinbein from returning to Maryland to stand trial reflected wider embarrassment in Israel over a ban on extraditing Jews — a ban many now believe to be outdated.

Justice Theodor Orr, writing for the majority, said the law contradicts extradition treaties Israel has signed — but that as long as the law was on the books, he had to uphold it.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who promised U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright last year that he would cooperate fully in extradition efforts, said he was disappointed.

"We did want to see extradition," Netanyahu told reporters in Tel Aviv. "We are a country of law. In a country of law, the law is interpreted by the Supreme Court."

Netanyahu promised that Sheinbein would be tried to the full extent of Israeli law.

"Justice will be done," he said. Even Sheinbein's attorney David Libai — a former Justice Minister who has said his client will plead guilty when he appears before an Israeli court — said the law needed changing.

"We cannot allow a situation where there's such a blatant contradiction between a treaty with the United States ... and Israeli law," he said.

Maryland authorities want Sheinbein for the killing of a man in Montgomery County, Md., in September 1997.

Sheinbein, who fled to Israel two days after Tello's dismembered and burned body was discovered in a Maryland garage, exploited a 1978 law that bars the extradition of Israeli citizens to other countries.

The law was passed at the urging of then-Prime Minister Menachem Begin, who felt that Jews should not be handed over to gentiles for judgment.

U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno said she was disappointed at Thursday's ruling, but expected to work with Israel in successfully prosecuting Sheinbein.

"We much prefer that the case be tried where the crime was committed," Reno said. "But if it has to be tried in another country, we want to make sure that the processes are in place that will permit it to happen, so that we see justice done regardless."

Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas Gansler also pledged to work with Israel to try Sheinbein.

"To say we're deeply disappointed in this ruling is an understatement," he said. "There is no further recourse. There are no more appeals. We do want to see justice is achieved."

Eliette Ramos, Tello's mother, said she was disappointed in the Israeli government and judiciary system.

"He and his family are laughing at both Israel and the United States, because they manipulated both countries," she said.

Sheinbein was to return to court within five days to face indictment, a Justice Ministry statement said. He faces a life sentence in Israel, as he did in Maryland, where authorities pledged not to seek a death sentence.

A life sentence in Israel rarely translates into longer than 18 years and prisoners enjoy conveniences — including holiday furloughs — rarely granted their U.S. counterparts.

Israeli officials clearly were nervous about U.S. reaction to the decision.

"What has to be remembered, and we will say it to the United States, is that justice will be done," said Irit Kahn, a senior Justice Ministry official who had argued in favor of extradition.

Robert Livingston, a Louisiana Republican who is chairman of the U.S. House Appropriations Committee, last year threatened to block U.S. aid to Israel if Sheinbein was not extradited.

Sheinbein had little contact with Israel prior to his flight — he claimed Israeli citizenship through his father, Sol, a Washington, D.C., patent lawyer who was born in pre-state Israel.

The parliament's Law Committee is considering a bill that would amend the law barring extradition.

Sheinbein's father has said he wanted his son tried in Israel because he feared for his safety in a U.S. prison. Sheinbein's alleged accomplice, Aaron Needle, committed suicide in a U.S. jail.

A lower court had ruled last year that even though Sheinbein technically could claim citizenship, he could be returned to the United States because he had no real affinity to Israel.

Aharon Barak, the chief justice, argued in favor of extradition.

"How can one imagine that a foreign citizen, whose affinity is with a foreign country, can argue before Israeli courts that he does not trust the laws of his country and its jurisprudence?" Barak wrote.

Youthville, Salvation Army protest change in foster care

By ROXANA HEGEMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Foster-care providers decried Thursday an agreement that would close group homes providing care for 90 children in Sedgwick County and western Kansas.

The contract, expected to be signed today between state welfare officials and United Methodist Youthville, attempts to resolve cash flow problems by putting more children in less expensive foster homes rather than in more institutional settings.

Youthville's subcontractors — local providers, such as the Salvation Army — called the agreement "shortsighted and ill-advised" in a news conference Thursday in Wichita.

Youthville officials did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment, but Bob Smith, Youthville's executive director, said on Thursday that his agency would not make money under the new contract with SRS, but would not lose money either.

"Both sides are comfortable with what we've worked out," he said. "What we have is doable."

Youthville operates by contracting with a network of local providers. The new contract excludes the Salvation Army, which is in the midst of building a new facility in part to provide a residential care facility for those children not ready to be placed in foster homes.

Under the agreement, Youthville will phase out 90 group-home beds, including 40 in western Kansas and 50 in Sedgwick County, by March 1, 2000. To offset the loss of group-home beds, Youthville and SRS hope to recruit 87 new foster homes by June 30.

Patrick Hanrahan, president of United Way of the Plains, called that plan grossly optimistic, saying it cannot be done.

That is because an average of three families must be recruited for each family the provider hopes to license ultimately, since most drop out before they complete training, he said. Then these families must go through a 10-week training program, plus a licensing process that takes at least eight weeks.

Under the new contract, Youthville plans to close its 10-bed facility in Holcomb by March 10.

Also ending is its support for the Salvation Army's 30-bed Booth Family Service Center in Wichita and the 10-bed Murdock House in Wichita. The Salvation Army said it will be forced to close those facilities, with the Booth facility closing in as little as four weeks.

Strikes still possible against Yugoslavia

■ Officials fear sides will build military positions.

By TOM RAUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration said it was concerned Thursday that both sides in the Kosovo dispute will use the recess in peace talks to fortify their military positions. Officials warned Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic that airstrikes are still a possibility and urged the Kosovo Albanian side to "show restraint or risk losing NATO support."

Administration officials told congressional panels a military retrenchment is a real possibility, now that both sides have gone home from the peace talks.

"The threat of force remains in effect," Deputy Defense Undersecretary Walter Slocombe told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

He cautioned Milosevic, in Belgrade, against using the recess to prepare a new Serb offensive against ethnic Albanians in the province.

"If Belgrade were foolish enough to attack the KLA in some deluded effort to destroy the insurgency before an agreement took effect, Belgrade would meet with strong NATO military action," Slocombe said.

By the same token, he said, Kosovo's independence-minded ethnic Albanian and the Kosovo Liberation Army "must show restraint or risk losing NATO's support."

Peace talks will resume in France on March 15. The talks, which were in a chateau in Rambouillet, near Paris, recessed earlier this week after 17 days of intense negotiations failed to produce a breakthrough.

On both sides of the Capitol, administration officials encountered skepticism over the fate of the peace process and toward the future U.S. military role in Kosovo should an agreement be reached.

President Clinton has said he is prepared to send up to 4,000 Americans to a 28,000-strong NATO peacekeeping force to go to Kosovo if a peace agreement is reached.

At a House International Relations Committee hearing, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was asked by Chairman Benjamin Gilman, R-N.Y., whether there was an exit strategy — or would Kosovo become another Bosnia?

"I think we have a tendency to forget that Bosnia has actually been a success," Albright said, noting that the peacekeeping there has enforced the peace accord and stopped the bloodshed.

"In Kosovo, we learned a lesson, I think, from Bosnia — or many lessons," Albright said. "One is not to wait as long as we did to do something. And the second is not to set an artificial deadline for exit."

Clinton initially assured Congress U.S. peacekeeping troops sent to Bosnia in late 1995 would be home within one year, but the mission is continuing today. There are about 6,700 U.S. troops in Bosnia, down from more than 22,000 at one point.

"IN KOSOVO, WE LEARNED A LESSON, I THINK, FROM BOSNIA — OR MANY LESSONS.

ONE IS NOT TO WAIT AS LONG AS WE DID TO DO SOMETHING. AND THE SECOND IS NOT TO SET AN ARTIFICIAL DEADLINE FOR EXIT."

— MADELINE ALBRIGHT
SECRETARY OF STATE

Albright said that the hope was that any peacekeeping force in Kosovo would be out in three years, but there was no guarantee.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services panel, said he hoped Congress could work with the administration in the coming weeks "in a unified way" in hopes of not undermining diplomacy designed to get both sides back to the peace table.

He urged Republicans and Democrats to support Clinton.

But Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said, "We have witnessed another major failure of diplomacy as U.S. and NATO-imposed deadlines have passed without commitments from either side."

Undersecretary of State Thomas Pickering told the Senate panel that the administration "didn't achieve all that we had hoped on a very ambitious set of goals. But the negotiations were important building blocks."

Pickering said the proposed settlement, which calls for a restoration of self-rule in Kosovo over a three-year period, is the best deal either side can expect.

Still, Pickering said, "the key challenge in the run-up to March 15 will be to minimize the military activity on both sides."

Pickering said there is no indication that Milosevic has softened his resistance to the idea of a NATO military intervention force.

"Our job No. 1 now is to keep the Albanian delegation moving on track," he said. "If they come along, they will have a NATO intervention force. They will have real opportunities to ... work their own future over the next couple of years."

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., asked Pickering whether a consensus remains among the United States, its European allies and Russia on dealing with the Kosovo crisis, "or is it already beginning to fragment?"

"It is my belief that it will hold, but we must do a lot of work to continue to keep it there, as we have in getting it there," Pickering said.

House rejects tax cuts for food tax, vehicles

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The House rejected a large package of tax cuts Thursday, just a day after it backed the plan.

On a 53-67 vote, the House turned down tax cuts that totaled about $200 million during the state's 2000 budget year, which begins July 1, and about $300 million the year after that.

The cuts would have included phasing out the state's 4.9-percent sales tax on groceries and property taxes on vehicles.

The House's vote came on a motion to advance the tax bill to final action. The bill will remain stranded on the House's debate calendar.

"A consensus has yet to emerge on how much tax cuts should be and which taxes should be cut," said Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, chairman of the House Taxation Committee.

As early as Thursday morning, the House appeared ready to throw its weight behind the tax reduction package, voting 65-55 to reject a motion from Rep. Dennis McKinney, D-Greensburg, to refer the bill to the Governmental Organization and Elections Committee.

Although the bill concerns the transfer of land to different rural water districts, House members added tax cut amendments to it Wednesday.

The House approved amendments Wednesday that would eliminate the food and vehicle taxes. Other amendments that met with approval included a decrease in the state's property tax levy for public schools and income tax credits for adoptive parents.

House members adjourned Wednesday night without finishing work on the bill when order broke down.

Representatives changed their minds Thursday afternoon about the bill and voted against it.

House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, said his colleagues probably decided the package was too large. Jennison said Wednesday that tacking numerous tax cuts onto the food-tax proposal would hurt the plan's chance of passage in the Senate.

"We were disappointed when they decided to pick this bill and put that on," Jennison said. "Another day we'll have a little more realistic discussion on taxes."

Earlier Thursday, Jennison said the tax debate started sooner than he would have liked it to, but he supported continuing the debate.

Adkins said he was disappointed the House decided to bypass the committee process.

"The House is going to have to discipline itself before it expects the Tax Committee to throw another grenade into the process," Adkins said. "Until we know we have 63 votes to pass a bill, I have no interest in passing a bill out of the committee."

Adkins said there is a good chance of passing a tax cut this year, but it probably will happen in the last days of the session, after the House finalizes bills on transportation and education spending.

"Revisiting the issue in here isn't going to make it any better. It's just going to be another day of embarrassment," Adkins said.

overhead, private gifts and the state that are funding the library.

Worcester said students know the library needs money, and they are opposed to paying through a privilege fee.

If students are willing to chip in money, Worcester said, he feels state legislators will be, too.

He said if students are behind it, it will happen.

"Let's show the state legislature we as students support our library and we want them to support it, too," Worcester said. "One of the messages we want to get across right now is that we are not opposed to library funding here at Kansas State University."

After Privilege Fee Committee rejected a proposed fee for library funding, it consulted the administration about the details of raising tuition.

Rawson said it would be a much better approach than the privilege fee approach.

If the tuition proposal is approved, it would have to be presented to the regents and the Kansas Legislature.

"It's been traditional that KU, K-State and Wichita have the same tuition, but it's not necessary," Rawson said. "I believe that if the proposal has merit, the board will approve it."

Barb Conant, director of communications of the board, said the board always looks at the effect any kind of initiative has on the whole system. Although the board is very concerned when it comes to tuition, she said the proposal has to be reviewed first by the Budget Development Committee.

"An increase in tuition has a dramatic effect on students and their families. But at the same time, we have two sources of funding for the board: state tax dollars and tuition," Conant said. "It's a tough balancing act."

DEATH

innocence, it's been obvious from the beginning that this community would get what they desire; so I'll close with the words of Francis Yockey: 'The promise of success is with the man who is determined to die proudly when it is no longer possible to live proudly.'

Yockey, who died in 1960, was an author of Nazi doctrine.

Prosecutors had urged the jury to sentence the 24-year-old King to death, arguing that he would be a menace even behind bars. A life sentence in Texas carries the possibility of parole after about 40 years.

"By giving Mr. King a life sentence, you're giving him at least 40 years to catch a black guard, a black nurse, a black doctor, a Jewish guard, a Jewish nurse, a Jewish doctor, or anybody else," prosecutor Pat Hardy said. "You're giving him a chance to catch anybody who doesn't believe in his satanic, racist views."

The jury rejected a tearful plea for mercy from King's father, Ronald, who is in a wheelchair and uses an oxygen tube to ease his emphysema. "We've invested a lot of love in that boy," the father said. "I'd hate to think we're going to lose him."

Afterward, jurors said they felt they had no choice but the death penalty for King, who prosecutors say carried out the crime because he wanted to do something "big" to establish credibility for a racist gang he was organizing.

"We looked for ways to not have to do what we did today, and they were not there," juror Lequeta Flowers said. "You just can't have this. Society cannot accept this."

The conviction and sentence will be appealed automatically. It could take six or seven years for his appeals to run out and the execution to take place.

Byrd, 49, was killed June 7 after he was given a lift while walking home from a party.

The crime shocked the nation with its savagery. Prosecutors said King and two other men beat him, attached him by the ankles to a pickup truck with a 24 1/2-foot logging chain and dragged him nearly three miles.

His head and right arm were torn off and his torso was dumped across from a black cemetery in what prosecutors said was a message of terror to other blacks.

Lawrence Brewer, 31, and Shawn Berry, 24, are awaiting trial. They, too, could get the death penalty. No trial dates have been set.

The only white man to be executed in Texas for killing a black was a farmer who killed another white farmer's favorite slave nearly 150 years ago, according to research published in The Sociological Quarterly in 1989.

Nationally, eight whites have been executed for killing blacks since the Supreme Court allowed the capital punishment to resume in 1976. Conversely, 123 blacks have been put to death for killing whites, according to the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, D.C.

Texas is by far the nation's most active death-penalty state, executing 170 people since 1982. The Texas total — Virginia is next with 61 — accounts for one-third of the nation's more than 500 executions since 1976.

Like all Texas inmates entering the system, King's first stop after sentencing was psychological and physical testing in the James Byrd Diagnostic Unit in Huntsville — named for a former warden unrelated to the victim.

review the effectiveness of new management and internal control.

Arts and Sciences Senator Joey Bahr said people were focusing too much on the past and should think about the future. He said people should be encouraged to help the station if they can.

Simon said with increased pay, the station could find someone who could create an environment to motivate students to produce good work. He said the students would make content decisions, but a station manager with the right level of job experience gets outstanding student media.

"If you want a better quality, better managed station, this is the way to go," Engineering Senator Elizabeth Gregory said.

Student Affairs and Social Services Committee Chair Robin Cates said she disagreed with the bill.

She said she disliked giving a salary increase to someone for a year, then taking it back the following year.

"I don't think so, we're not doing this to a person," Cates said.

She said she talked to other people in the area, and they said they make less than the figure described in the original bill. She said she felt the manager's salary should be compared to other station managers' salaries in the area, not other schools, as in past Senate debate.

Other Senate business included an emergency allocation totaling $60,696 to the K-State Student Union. The bill passed 37-4.

The emergency funding is to upgrade the Union computer system to make it Year 2000 compliant.

The allocation is a one-time deal to switch to the new system. The rest of the upgrades will be made in increments. If the bill had not passed, the Union would not be in compliance with its vendors, Union Director Bernard Pitts said.

documenting our programming."

Kellie McClellan, Panhellenic Council public relations director, said K-State probably has the best greek system in the Midwest region.

"I realized what a strong greek system K-State does have," she said. "We are really progressive as far as the problems other greek organizations have."

McClellan said she is disappointed the Panhellenic Council didn't receive the highest award possible but is pleased with the awards the organization did receive. She said preparing for the event was time consuming, but the awards made the work worthwhile.

"It's a pretty tedious process, but it was really worth it when we had the final product," McClellan said. "It really gives us something for all the work we put into it."

"She's not fake," Rottinghaus said. "She is a shy girl, but this is her time to shine."

will speak at schools and emphasize the importance of setting goals and moral values.

"Fulfilling the dream of making it into medical school is my personal goal," Ediger said. "And family is probably the most important moral value."

In July, Ediger will surrender the title of Miss Kansas Coed, and in November, she will crown the future Miss American Coed. In the meantime, she will represent what the pageant is all about, said Ediger's friend Katie Rottinghaus, freshman in pre-nursing.

Wal-Mart decision expected

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter development issue might come to a resolution at the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board meeting at 7 tonight in the City Commission room of City Hall.

The Feb. 1 board meeting adjourned with no final decision after more than four hours of debate and discussion about the proposed supercenter. Now the issue returns to the board and proponents, as well as opponents, have been preparing to state their cases.

This fall, Wal-Mart made its plans public for a 153,085-square foot, 24-hour supercenter at the intersection of Southwind Place and Seth Childs Road, providing the same services as the current Manhattan Wal-Mart plus a grocery store.

Tonight's meeting will continue the debate on if this location should be zoned for the proposed store. Protests to the new business have branched out into concerns about the store's effect on the neighborhood, competing businesses and local ecology.

Neighborhood Watch

Debbie Hortin is a member of the Arbor Heights-Warner Park Neighborhood Association, a group that sprang up in October to oppose the supercenter.

She said the store will change the area from a low-impact neighborhood where residents can walk to see the stars at night to a place of noise and light pollution. According to the city planners' report, the closest house sits 150 to 160 feet from the edge of the proposed store's loading dock.

The report recommended several changes to the current site plan. The number of signs on and around the building would be reduced, and no pole signs would be allowed. Parking spaces proposed would be reduced from 748 to 686, converting the other 62 spaces to landscape islands. All lighting was recommended to remain downcast, and light poles standing higher than the grade of nearby Shuss Road should be lowered.

Student arrested for shooting death

By BRIAN HERNANDEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student who shot and killed a masked burglar in January was arrested for murder Thursday by the Riley County Police Department.

Richard B. Jones, 711 N. Juliette Ave., Apt. 6, was arrested and charged with second-degree murder in the death of Steven Waters, 28. Jones, 25, senior in business, also was charged with possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia. He is in the Riley County Jail on $100,000 bond.

Police said Jones fired at Waters after he and two others from Junction City broke into Jones' house on Jan. 5. Tyler Greule, 25, allegedly was shot in the left foot by Jones as well. Eric D. Wilson, 28, was uninjured. The RCPD said two of the intruders were armed.

Police said they have received conflicting stories about what transpired the night of the break-in, and no motive for the break-in has been released.

Police also said the three intruders did not know Jones or any of the other three people at his house at the time of the shooting. Ralph E. Thomas III, 25, and Emily L. Dossett, 21, were in the apartment with Jones and his roommate, Nathan L. Fox, 24.

In a January interview, Thomas said he and Fox were in the living room and Jones and Dossett were in a back room when a knock came at the front door.

When Fox opened the door, three men in ski masks, at least two of whom were carrying guns, came in and forced Thomas and Fox to the floor, Thomas said.

He said Jones looked out from the rear of the home, saw the men, ducked back into his room and came out with his own handgun.

Thomas said he didn't remember all the details of what happened next. Jones and the intruders began yelling at one another and shots were fired, he said. With a shotgun barrel against his head, Thomas said he couldn't see everything that took place.

Waters ran out of the room and later was found to have gunshot wounds to his chest. He died at Mercy Health Center on College Avenue.

Greule was brought back to the living room, and he and Wilson were unmasked. Dossett called 911, and Jones made a second call to tell the police his gun's registration number, Thomas said.

Greule was treated and released for a gunshot wound to his left foot.

Greule and Wilson both were arrested and charged with one felony count of conspiracy to commit burglary, aggravated burglary, aggravated assault and criminal possession of

Pi Kappa Alpha reorganizes chapter, evaluates finances

By ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Alpha Omega Chapter of Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity at K-State has entered a financial receivership program to reorganize its chapter financially.

Pi Kappa Alpha has been under review since fall 1997 in order to improve the current condition of the chapter and to reevaluate its finances. Decisions regarding the reorganizing are to be left up to the Pi Kappa Alpha Memorial Headquarters and those alumni on the receivership board. All members were placed on early alumni status until the review is conducted March 14.

Barb Robel, adviser of Greek Affairs, said she, along with the fraternity council officers and chapter officers, called the national headquarters to talk about the many red flags they were seeing.

"In terms of the chapter not being able to pay its bills, poor GPA for the chapter as a whole and some risk management issues, the chapter then went under review," Robel said. "For this past year this review has been ongoing, and this is the result of that review."

When the review is done, Robel said she hoped it will result in a different, reorganized chapter with a few of the same members.

Steve Heck, chairman of the financial receivership board, will be a part of the process conducted for the reorganization of the chapter. He said the financial problem is not due to the current members but that they have inherited a culmination of poor financial management.

"We believe that this is something the chapter can overcome," Heck said.

After the review is conducted, members who are responsive to a new and improved chapter will be invited back and become an active member again. Those not invited to rejoin will remain on early alumni status and will have no interaction with the chapter for a period of three years.

The membership review will consist of interviews concerning scholarships, finances, leadership within the fraternity and on campus, and overall conduct.

"No one factor will weigh more heavily than the other," Heck said. "It will be subjective, because we don't assign a certain value to a certain GPA or to a certain position in the chapter."

Brett Gabrielson, president of Pi Kappa Alpha at K-State, said at first the review was scary but the outcome will be positive.

"This is just restructuring so it will help us out of the kinks," Gabrielson said.

Accident kills Fort Riley soldier

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One Fort Riley soldier was killed and another injured Sunday night as the car they were in ran through a guard rail on Fort Riley Boulevard and fell about 15 feet into a ditch.

The two were transported to Irwin Army Community Hospital at Fort Riley. Hospital officials said Calvin Wooden died from severe trauma, and William Valentine, who was driving, was treated for a broken right leg and a fracture in his left arm.

Jack Boggs, a patrol officer with Riley County Police Department, said both soldiers left the scene in critical condition but that both were expected to survive.

"We think they're going to make it,"

Entrance closed beginning today

The one-way entrance to Mid-Campus Drive from Anderson Avenue will be closed for nearly 10 days beginning this morning, officials said.

Jerry Petty, director of public works, said the closing is needed in order to take a storm drain across a section of the road. However, he said he doesn't anticipate any traffic congestion.

"That exit from Anderson will be closed completely, but 17th Street will still remain open, and that will provide an entrance to the campus," Petty said.

Gary Kilner, assistant to the university engineer, said that because there are other routes to enter Mid-Campus Drive from Anderson Avenue — such as through the K-State Student Union parking lot — traffic will not be a problem.

The construction also will close the access street near Nichols and Calvin halls, because the only access is the one-way entrance off Anderson Avenue.

"I don't think there will be much of a problem with the construction," Kilner said. "I think that most of the people who use these roads have already gotten the feel that it's a bit congested."

New museum director hired following 7-month search

Lorne Render has been named the new director of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art after a 7-month national search. Render is the executive director of the C.M. Russell Museum in Great Falls, Mont.

"I am pleased we were able to attract Lorne Render to lead the Beach Museum into the next century," said Charles Reagan, interim director of the Beach art museum and executive assistant to President Jon Wefald.

"He is a highly regarded and very experienced museum director. Render had the greatest experience and will be a good fit to K-State," Reagan said.

Render already has several tasks ahead of him when he begins working on May 1.

Accreditation issues will be the first to be confronted, Reagan said.

"Accreditation deals with policies and procedures that museums deal with," Reagan said. "It takes 3 to 4 years for new museums."

Render has served as curator and director of exhibitions at the Glenbow Museum in Calgary, Alberta, and on the art department faculty at the University of Calgary from 1967 to 1977. He also served as head of the exhibit design services department at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto. In 1991, Render was named director of the C.M. Russell Museum, one of five museums in Montana to be accredited by the American Association of Museums.

Render graduated with both a bachelor's and master's degree of art from the University of Oregon. He is also a graduate of the Museum Management Institute of the Arts, run by the J. Paul Getty Trust, the American Federation of the Arts and the University Art Museum at the University of California, Berkeley.

The search committee was led by Reagan and included the members of the Museum Advisory Board. It was assisted by La Paglia and Associates of Knoxville, Tenn.

"The Beach Museum is one of the centerpieces of Kansas State University," Wefald said. "That is why it is so important that we were able to hire such an outstanding museum professional as Lorne Render."

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

A story about the Student Senate meeting in Friday's Collegian contained an error.

Only one student privilege-fee increase was approved Thursday night. Two of the bills passed were one-time, emergency allocations to KSDB-FM 91.9 and the K-State Student Union. The third bill, an increase in the fee for the Wildcat 91.9, won't make students' fees go up. The money will be generated by increases in K-State's enrollment.

The Collegian regrets the error.

If you see something that should be corrected, call News Editor Joe Hurla at 532-6556 or e-mail collegn@ksu.edu.

Candidates to consider student concerns, input

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With elections nearing, student body president and vice president candidates Jason Heinrich and Gabe Eckert are focused on their campaign, "Designed With You In Mind."

Heinrich, senior in industrial engineering, and Eckert, senior in agricultural journalism, are concentrating on ways to involve students in the decision-making process.

If elected, the running mates want to gather as much input and opinion as possible from the campus community, Heinrich said.

"We decided that we really want to bring a team approach to student government," Heinrich said. "We want to try to get as many people involved as we can and make people aware of what's going on on campus."

Heinrich and Eckert come from a diverse background of experiences and involvement, which they said makes them a good team. They said they work well with each other to find the best solutions for everybody.

"I've had a lot of experience working with administrators and alumni, and Gabe has probably had more student government experience than about anybody on campus," Heinrich said.

Heinrich has had the positions of K-State student ambassador, president of Blue Key Senior Honorary, vice president of the Interfraternity Council and member of the Student Alumni Board. Eckert has had several positions in student government, including his current position as Student Senate chair, and as allocations chair and Student Governing Association treasurer.

Heinrich and Eckert have focused on four main issues during their campaign.

paign.

"Our issues are going to reach every student on this campus, and we're going to work as hard as we can during our term to make sure every student on this campus benefits from our time in office," Eckert said.

They said they plan to restructure finals week to give students a break in the middle of their final exams. This plan would give students more time to study and focus, which would allow them to perform better on their exams.

The pair said they want to expand the uses of the residence hall meal plans to include the K-State Student Union.

"If you have a class during the day and you can't make it back to the residence hall to eat, you can have more flexibility to stay on campus and use your money more wisely," Eckert said.

Another plan, they said, is to restructure the reimbursement schedule for dropping classes.

Students have only one week to drop a class and receive a 100-percent refund, but with Heinrich and Eckert's plan, students will have a longer period of time to receive a full refund for dropped classes, they said.

This will give students more time to decide whether they want to drop a class or not, they said.

Their fourth issue is the expansion and improvement of Internet services provided to students. Their plan would allow students to reserve textbooks electronically as they enroll in classes. It also would make electronic voting possible, which would allow students more access to voting for student body elections and referendums.

"Through electronic voting and some of the other initiatives we're proposing, we're trying to get more people involved and trying to get more input from students," Heinrich said. "We really think that's going to increase voter awareness and voter turnout when it comes down to election time."

In addition to these plans, Heinrich and Eckert said they are working on ways to get more input and feedback from the campus community.

They have created a University Leadership Council that will provide a communications link between all students and the issues being considered by SGA, they said.

"Anyone who wants to apply can apply to be on this council," Eckert said. "It would be kind of a sounding board to discuss issues and provide direction for student government."

They said they also want to organize a call-in radio show on KSDB-FM 91.9 to allow students to express their views and opinions about student government and get answers to their questions.

The running mates said they'd like to create a presidents' luncheon, which would involve leaders from all campus organizations getting together to address campuswide issues and to create more cooperation between organizations.

CES requests privilege fee to improve technology, enhance programs

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If a privilege fee request for $85,000 per year made by Career Employment Services on Sunday is received favorably by Student Senate, it could be the only new fee created in the past two years.

Career and Employment Services provides resources such as the career resource library, employment services, part-time employment listings, co-op/internship listings, summer employment listings and volunteer opportunities.

Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services, said the goal of the request is to serve the student body better.

"Career and Employment Services helps students in making independent career decisions and developing life-long skills, which help them to apply academic preparation and training in their occupation of choice," Fraser said.

Most of the resources, employment services and other advising and training are free to students, with the exception of an annual $10 registration fee that allows students access to listings for on-campus interviews and electronic résumé registration.

If the request for a privilege fee was granted, the $10 registration fee could be suspended.

The requested funds also would go into technology enhancements, allowing employers of K-State students to access the student résumé database online or review candidate résumés for positions.

Students also would be able to monitor their résumé referral history or when an employer reviewed their credentials. Students could request, monitor and sign-up for an interview via the World Wide Web.

The funds could go into program enhancements, possibly offering virtual career fairs or an all-university career fair interview day, which would be planned for the day following the career fair and allow employers to interview students.

"We see our role as more of a liaison rather than the one who should receive any benefits," Fraser said.

Jeff Meder, Privilege Fee Committee chair, said the timing of the request is good because the committee has excess money but warned that Senate members would weigh the decision carefully.

"We'll have to see whether the Senate thinks the fee will only benefit those who already use Career and Employment Services or if the privilege fee will benefit everyone," Meder said.

Other items during the privilege-fee meeting included two swift 8-0 votes that passed two budget agreements for Recreational Services.

The recreational services privilege fee budget was set for $350,996 for the next three fiscal years and the replacement reserve budget continuance was set for $9,609.

The bill will go before Senate on Thursday.

West-side Wal-Mart in city's best interest

The Urban Planning Board does not want to send the message that Manhattan is against development.

It is in the best interest of the board and the community that Wal-Mart be allowed to construct a new supercenter at the intersection of Southwind Place and Seth Childs Road. Manhattan is growing. It will continue to grow.

That doesn't mean citizens who oppose the plan are wrong. The development will undoubtedly change the landscape of the west side. But Wal-Mart is doing everything it can to appease residents in that area. It has altered its plans with parking and lighting to try to ease the strain on the residents.

But it is important that citizens continue to pressure Wal-Mart into serving the community and not trying to overtake it. After all, it is not Wal-Mart's community.

There is much speculation about what will happen to the current Wal-Mart on Tuttle Creek Boulevard. Sometime down the road, management might choose to close that store. As prudent as that might seem at the time, it would be unfair for Wal-Mart to continue to own the building and thus keep out competitors such as Target. But since the Manhattan community is making sacrifices to allow Wal-Mart to continue development, it would be unfair for it to take advantage of the situation and hinder development.

Hopefully, Wal-Mart will follow its own example of trying to advance the community, and the new supercenter will act as a welcome sign to other businesses.

EVOLUTION OF CREATIVE ARTISTIC EXPRESSION

REPRESSION of EXPRESSION

Education system fails to provide forum for artistic freedom as students get older

The creativity our parents and our education system upheld when we were younger has been tossed aside for hard facts, concrete information and lack of expression. The older we get, the less society cares about our need to express ourselves, until it's too late to reverse the repression.

I'm an assistant debate/forensics coach for the high school, and on weekends, I'm enlightened by the Kansas high schools, middle schools and elementary schools in which tournaments are held. I'd like to thank their halls and classrooms for illustrating my point.

In elementary school, all children are encouraged to express themselves through writing, drawing and singing, and they are praised for this expression, regardless of talent. These are the main tools for education, and they are cherished, as the walls of Concordia Elementary School showed me last November.

In between debate rounds, when my students were off being the talented individuals that they are, I walked around observing the artistic society of youth. There were self portraits, pictures of turkeys, collaged counting charts, book reviews and poetry everywhere.

All the children told a different story with their work. Every piece of expression was different, and in elementary school, that was okay. "My name is Jane. I have a dog named spot. I like to read. I am good at drawing."

Moving on to middle school, that lovely in between stage when everyone is awkward but trying to cover by being cool and conformist.

Here, I've found the expression is nearly gone. I remember when writing in middle school shifted focus to reactions, things and topics. While this kind of writing was beneficial, we had begun to lose expression of thoughts, feelings, and identity. There was a shift from "this is who I am, and that's okay" to "this is who I should be, and this is what I should express." Drawing was completely out of the picture unless it was to sketch a cell or a paramedical, and participation in singing and drama became optional. The discouragement begins — you are either good or bad at something.

Here we begin to go down the tubes. Today's society wonders why suicide rates are up, why kids are bringing guns to school, and why puberty is such a messed-up stage in American adolescent life. Maybe the adolescents of today are just trying to tell us something and they have no way to express it. They've lost the creative edge that lets them discover new ideas and a better life.

School begins to prohibit the release of emotion through education, and rather than incorporating free expression into the curriculum, it all boils inside. No one notices until the kettle starts to whistle.

By the time you hit high school, it's all lost, save for the few who choose to participate in the arts at their schools.

There's no art on the walls except for a few pieces displayed from an art class or some lovely banners screaming "Beat the (insert mascot name here)," "Kill 'em," or "Skin the (mascot)."

There's no time for creative writing, save for a free journal writing assignment elaborating on an assigned topic or conversations written in urinal stalls. I recall one such conversation while visiting a well-to-do Kansas City school. "If I commit suicide will I go to hell?" she asked, and then there came a stream of replies: "Yes," "Yes," "No," "Suicide is a sin," "God hates killers," "There is no heaven or hell. When you die there is nothing." In a way I was glad these girls were expressing their feelings and opinions in some way, and then I thought about how the suicidal one must feel when she sees those words of despair every day.

Maybe we shouldn't make bathroom stalls the last place for expression.

I've noticed that school administrations are catching on to the despair and lack of self esteem. Their method for counteracting the repression of expression is to put up banners on the walls which promote self esteem and individuality. "Education es la fuerza!" "Violence is never the answer." "We're building a better school one student at a time." "At our school, we're all pulling together. Our goal — to empower all students to succeed in changing the world." Maybe it's too late to convince them that they can change the world when they don't even know who they are, let alone, who they are in relation to the world.

What was lost sometimes has a hard time being found. I see the loss of the encouragement of artistic expression as a serious contributing factor to the decline in self esteem and decrease of positive attitude.

The world is a messed up place full of messed up people. I wonder how much brighter it would all be if we were encouraged to use artistic expression to figure ourselves out not only in elementary school, but throughout life.

Sometimes K-State's best teachers aren't necessarily instructors

Odds are, you don't know who Jeri Slagle was or even that she is gone, and for that, I'm sorry.

The one image of her I still have in my mind is her at her desk, looking up, smiling. Jeri was, if you like titles, an "office specialist" in the English department. Pretty small words for such a big job. To be honest, I don't know what all fell under her purview, except that if it was important, you took it to Jeri.

Jeri handled every conceivable form of paperwork, that lifeblood of the academic existence. On campus, where high positions sometimes come without a grounding in practicality, Jeri was an anchor of how to get things done. She could, in times of need, even give incoming students advice on the right classes to take, being an interim adviser when one was nowhere to be found. She dealt with some of the more erratic personalities at K-State and did so with grace and humor. She, with her office mates Linda and Sara, was one of the "three witches of Denison Hall" on Halloween, an affectionate designation in the Macbeth-savvy English department.

Of course, she contributed on a quiet, consistent basis to the point where one didn't even really think about it anymore. Why attract attention when you can just get the job done to the best of your ability, anyway? The rest of the department and I got used to walking down the basement corridor of Denison, turning as we passed her door and seeing her smiling while looking up from her desk.

I spent some time in the theater department, and upon my return to English, Jeri was already fighting for her life.

Ovarian cancer is stealthier than most, as it doesn't advertise its presence. Less than a quarter of patients find it while it is confined to the ovary. Its symptoms, though, are so innocuous they could pass for more daily distractions as opposed to a life-threatening illness. She held fast while she was treated with chemotherapy.

I can't wait until we're sufficiently advanced as a society to file chemotherapy in the same dusty cabinet now holding trepannery and leeching. It's a brutal, painful process that mocks the word "therapy," and the fact that it's the best we've got right now still darkens my day. Jeri kept smiling, though, and I'll never know how. And she kept coming to work. I had to get a substitute when I had a head and chest cold, but Jeri just wouldn't stop, walking into work, pulling her oxygen bottle behind her, quietly and patiently defiant.

I remember the Tuesday Jeri left work for the last time, and she was visibly drained, shattered both from the toll of the cancer and from treatments almost as harsh as the disease. The department was too stunned to give her a proper farewell, and really, anything we did seemed oddly insignificant for all the time given to us. But we tried. The plan was to sign a card and sing in the hallway. So the students and faculty of the English department tried to organize something without Jeri finding out about it. I'm not quite sure what happened (I turned around and people started singing), but I don't think it worked, though she was touched by the gesture. Our organizational skills just don't fall into place sometimes.

The doctors gave Jeri six months at most, but she didn't have six days, slipping away in her sleep the next Sunday night, probably the closest thing to mercy she found during her illness. That's when it really sank in. Her best days she spent with us, at work of all places, keeping us in line and sharing her smiles. I waited for campus to recognize what had been lost. This was a month ago.

And I'm still waiting. Jeri wasn't tenured and was a student long ago but no longer. No, she was only staff, the hired help, but she didn't really matter. She can work as hard as any person with or working for a degree, but for reasons which completely escape me, we like to pretend she's somehow intruding on the purity of academia because she's neither teacher nor student. The silence from the local news media still deafens me. "Only staff," I guess.

Of course, this ignores the fact that learning isn't restricted to inside classroom walls. I learned more from Jeri Slagle than I have from dozens of instructors. It is elitism or stupidity which keeps us looking down upon the staff, as if they have nothing to offer, as if they aren't every bit as human and mortal as we are, as if they aren't also prey to the same terrors and triumphs; this is the thinking of a shallow, stagnant mind. I learned from Jeri because her door was always open to me and to the department, for us with whom she chose to share her time, even when it became too short, and you don't need a degree to be the best kind of teacher. Attention must be paid.

I keep looking in her office (it's not "her" office anymore, of course) as I walk by, and every time I do, she's not there, and my stride misses a step. Eventually my feet will fall into place again, but right now, the void is still too fresh. I will donate some cat food to the animal shelter as she would have wanted, and I'll do my best to make sure that when the quiet cancer whispers, people listen.

But that's next week.

Heinrich, Eckert focus on changes in finals week, increased Internet services

Designed with you in mind — issues that matter. Issues that affect every student; issues that we can accomplish during our term in office. The Heinrich-Eckert platform is a combination of ambitious, student-oriented issues that truly are designed with you in mind.

Finals week is one of the most important parts of the academic year. However, with finals crammed into a five-day period, it is easy to become overstressed and perform less than perfectly during the last days of finals.

We are proposing splitting finals week over a weekend. This will give students more time to study and focus during finals. We believe this schedule will allow students to finish finals week strong and consequently increase their grade point average.

Our platform also incorporates initiatives that expand and improve the quality of services provided to students over the Internet. We want to provide students with the opportunity to vote on-line for elections and referendums. Electronic voting at other universities has increased voter turnout by as much as 200 percent. At K-State, this system will make voting more accessible to every student.

We truly will work to create a new online book reservation system that allows students to reserve textbooks electronically when they enroll in classes over the Internet. This will eliminate the hassle of driving all over town and still finding out no one has the needed book.

Additionally, we would like to develop a system giving students in residence halls the flexibility to use their meal plan anywhere on campus, including the dining centers and the K-State Student Union.

Residence-hall meal plans are required to be used within the dining centers.

If students are unable to eat all of their meals there, or if they decide to eat on campus during the day, they cannot use all of their allotted meals and could lose the money they paid. Our system will allow students to use their meal plan to its full potential and to use their money more wisely.

We are also proposing a new timeline for reimbursing students for classes they drop. Students now have only one week after classes begin to drop a class and receive a 100-percent refund. We will develop a plan that gives students a longer period of time to receive a 100-percent refund. This will save students money and give them more flexibility.

We are confident we can achieve these ambitious goals during our term in office. In addition, we are also committed to solving long-term issues at K-State, including increasing library funding and faculty salaries. We will work closely with the Kansas Board of Regents and the state Legislature to secure additional funding for the library through a tuition increase earmarked for the library and also to provide higher faculty salaries.

For more information about our platform, visit our Web site at www-personal.ksu.edu/~jheintr.

We would appreciate your support on March 8-10.

Remember to vote Heinrich and Eckert for issues that are truly designed with you in mind.

I think that the age-old saying, "You shouldn't judge something until you experience it," holds true. If anybody who is a non-greek would like to come over and hang out at any of the greek houses just for a day to see what it's like, they should. Then you'll see if we're really as bad as they say we are.

I wanted to congratulate the Cats on a great game, and thanks to the seniors for all their efforts.

Sorry you didn't get bid by anybody, Danedri.

It costs less for me to live in a greek house than it did to live in the dorms. So if you're saying I pay for my friends by living in a greek house, how come I'm paying less than the people in the dorms?

Danedri Thompson is trying to get the same sort of attention Todd Stewart got a few years ago. The only difference is, Todd Stewart had a good point.

In response to the survey about students being dissatisfied at K-State, I feel this is more accurate than people want to believe. As far as I'm concerned, Pat Bosco should be flamed for not wanting to hear about it. It seems to me that he's more concerned with recruiting students than keeping the ones who pay his salary happy. To tell you the truth, I know quite a few people who feel like a social security number.

I think it's time for certain greeks and certain independents to stop using the fourum to stab each other in the back.

The women need to play at a time other than opposite the men. There are 168 hours in a week.

If you don't like this school — leave. If you don't like the music — turn the radio station. If you don't like the Collegian — don't read it. No one's forcing you to do any of these things.

With the recent firing of Lakers coach Del Harris, do you think Kansas State University would be able to hire him?

In regards to whoever wrote the comment about who received the longest beating with the ugly stick, it would definitely have to be Dennis Rodman because Vanilla Ice is a total babe.

Let's not make this into a campus quarrel. Greeks and independents are all just students, and we have one common goal and that's to get through school and graduate. Let's just all get along.

To R.A. Hartman: using long words doesn't make you smart.

READERS write

Columnist's assumptions about greeks misleading

Editor,

I am writing in reference to Danedri Thompson's column printed Wednesday concerning the greek image. Her column makes references to greek stereotyping. The column also contends that hazing is rampant within the system. Finally, her column paints a picture of a community that shuns diversity.

Assuming her opinion is well-researched and completely valid, should stereotypes be combated with continued, blatant stereotyping? Her fight-fire-with-fire attitude toward print journalism is disturbing. Her efforts to tear down the greek system with biased and stereotypical statements have failed. Greek organizations began as, and continue to be, institutions that provide students with a well-rounded education.

It is my belief that in every criticism there exists at least 10-percent truth. Hazing does exist in the greek system. However, other organizations also must confront hazing problems. The fact remains that efforts by students within the system to combat this behavior often go unseen. It is impossible to see the heated conversations until 3 a.m. and the endless meetings on hazing unless you are involved directly. Therefore, I can understand how easy it is for a weak person to persecute the whole for actions committed by a few members.

Lastly, I would like to comment on the elitism implied in Thompson's column. She contends greek friends are, at least initially, of the same sex. They belong to the same race. Their parents belong to the same economic category. These comments reveal her distorted perception of the truth. I don't remember when women's groups or minority groups last were persecuted for not practicing diversity in their organizations. The fact is, these organizations are less diverse than the greek community. Greek councils have positions dedicated to multicultural awareness and programming. Many students receive scholarships from their chapters or work out plans with their organizations to afford living expenses. So again, the next time you decide to engage in mudslinging, research your topic.

Until there surfaces a writer who places importance in fact rather than opinion, the greek system will have to endure the type of print journalism for which the Collegian and its writers stand. To the staff of the Collegian: Please value your readership enough to print well-thought out, well-written and well-researched material.

Portrayals of greek life by columnist inaccurate

Editor,

I am writing in direct response to Danedri Thompson's column on Wednesday. Although K-State's paper has traditionally maintained some level of professionalism, the printing of this blatant hate letter to the entire greek system deserves comment.

Thompson portrayed greeks as materialistic segregationists who buy their friends. She said the greek system is a prejudiced organization set on excluding everyone except the rich and famous from their ranks, and implied that greeks routinely haze their members. To back up her statements, she cited examples from the movie "Animal House," which everyone knows is perfectly accurate. Wake up. Would anyone cite in their research papers the works of Spike Lee, Oliver Stone, or Steven Spielberg? Evidently the Collegian will.

Thompson's uninformed, malicious attack on the greek system was a disgrace to the Collegian. You printed the rantings of a prejudiced person, and you attacked an important part of many students' lives. You classed all greeks together under an imaginary image developed from TV shows and movies and the dreams of a delusional writer.

If the Collegian truly wants to move in the direction set by Thompson, perhaps you should contact other hate groups and even a few paramilitary organizations to write for you. You know, just to be fair. You routinely could degrade a new group on campus each week until you had attacked each minority, homosexuals, heterosexuals, women, basketball players, engineering majors and faculty members.

Why stop with just attacking greeks? There are so many groups out there to hate and lie about.

Stereotype of greeks fails to show positives aspects

Editor,

Danedri Thompson's column "Enjoy hazing? Materialism? Sign up for the greek system" hinted at some valid points of concern regarding the greek system. Rush week at K-State is probably not the best way for women to pick which house they want to join. The system has worked for most in years past. We constantly brainstorm for new ways to get to know potential members on a more personal level.

Another point well made was the hazing argument. Hazing is a useless tactic to prove "loyalty" that eventually tears a house down. Our house — as well as the majority, if not all houses on campus — does not condone hazing.

Thompson denounces stereotyping; however, that is precisely what she is doing in the remainder of her article. Greeks do many outstanding things for K-State and the community. Along with the good, however, comes the extensive publicity of the bad. No one is perfect.

K-State emphasizes community service for all students. The greek system's community service efforts are only one of many ways to facilitate such services.

K-State greek members do have a higher overall GPA (3.093) than non-greek members (2.831). Only 20 percent of the K-State population is greek, yet 65 percent of the campus leaders are greek, according to the most recent survey by Greek Affairs. In addition, the same tests that are available in our study files are often available on the Internet and in the library — it's no big secret. Besides, did Thompson criticize the athletic teams or scholarship houses for the scholastic aid they receive? No.

We do not pay for our friends. We pay our rent and our national dues, which members of nearly every campus organization must pay.

The greek system might not be for everyone, and that's fine. We don't criticize those who choose not to join, so please stop criticizing those who do. But if you must, stop and ponder your thoughts before you publish them. Because of the actions of a few, you cannot hold an entire group of the campus population responsible.

Next time, get a taste of greek life before you bash it.

Cats stun No. 22 Jayhawks, 69-58

BY SARAH CRAIG

The K-State women's basketball team gave No. 22 Kansas a chance to grab a victory for a short period of time before taking control of the lead and defeating the Jayhawks on Saturday 69-58 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats were led by junior center Angie Finkes, who led the team in both scoring, with a career-high 28 points, and in rebounding, with seven.

Head coach Deb Patterson said this game speaks volumes for her team, which has struggled recently with Finkes benched with an injury.

"I think it just illustrates again the toughness and character of this team over the last five games," Patterson said. "We have a team that, in spite of adversity, still believed they could win."

K-State led the Jayhawks for most of the first half, keeping All-America forward Lynn Pride to only one field goal. The Jayhawks began to close the gap late in the first half, gaining their first lead of the game, 26-25, with 1:25 left to go.

The Cats answered with a three-pointer from freshman guard Kristin Rethman, who had missed her first two attempts that half. KU, however, had an answer, when sophomore guard Jennifer Jackson made a shot under the basket to tie the score, 28-28, just before halftime.

In the second half, Pride poured in 13 points to help KU gain some momentum to go on a 14-2 run in the first 5 minutes of the half.

K-State refused to give in though, as sophomore forward Brandy Harris got a steal, giving K-State the possession for sophomore guard Kim Woodlee to hit a three pointer. It forced Kansas to call a timeout as the Cats brought the score to 35-42.

"We didn't start the second half very well, but we knew that we had to step it up, that we had to play defense and rebound, or we were going to lose," said

Harris, who set a career high with five assists.

When Finkes scored two field goals to cut the lead to five, Patterson said she saw her team making strides at that point.

"I think we made great decisions on the offensive end of the floor, and unlike the rest of the games, when we needed stops on defense, we got them; and when we needed offense, they got the ball inside," Patterson said. "I think it was just our ability to focus and compete and not think it was going to be easy."

After the second Kansas timeout of the half, junior center Olga Firsova fouled out with 11:16 left, and junior forward Nicky Ramage came back into the game. The Cats continued to cut the lead steadily with points from Finkes and a three-pointer from Woodlee. Ramage scored with 9:23 left, putting the Cats back on top 48-47.

The Hawks tried to fight back into the game, but the Cats held the advantage over KU in rebounding 32-18 and three-point shooting as the Hawks made one of seven attempts. The Cats made seven of 14 three-point field goals.

K-State also was encouraged by the 8,015 fans in Bramlage, the second-largest crowd in school history.

"This was a great win for us, and I think it was as exciting an environment as we've played in for us," Patterson said.

Finkes said she hated watching her team play as she sat on the bench but that she feels her comeback will add momentum in the tournament.

"When I came back, I was ready to go full speed because I knew that we were good enough to beat the teams we play," Finkes said.

"This proves to us that we are good enough to go into the Big 12 Tournament and go all the way if we want."

Finkes' return from injury inspires teammates in upset victory over KU

BY NICK GRATKOVIC

K-State junior center Angie Finkes took over the second half against Kansas on Saturday to hit her first six shots, leading the Cats to victory.

Finkes bounced back from a leg injury to electrify a crowd and inspire her teammates.

"It was exciting to see the impact that Angie Finkes can make in a game," head coach Deb Patterson said. "Her line was not only productive, but it was extremely inspirational."

Finkes was playing only her second game since coming back from her leg injury, scoring a career-high 28 points in 36 minutes of play. Finkes said it was nice to see her team play up to its potential and that sitting out with an injury increased her desire to play.

"When I came back, I was ready to go full speed. I didn't care if I had to run down a freight train," Finkes said. "I knew that we were good enough to beat the teams that we play."

Finkes had 12 first-half points and seemed to get stronger as the game went along. She was 12-15 from the floor in the game, with seven rebounds.

Entering the game, Patterson said she would have been pleased if she had gotten 20 minutes out of Finkes.

Finkes said it didn't matter how she felt, as long as the team won.

"My leg really doesn't hurt anymore," Finkes said. "It didn't matter really, I was going to play because I really wanted to beat KU."

Finkes started the second half hitting her first six shots to keep the Cats in the game.

Teammate Brandy Harris said having Finkes back in the line-up brought an increased level of intensity to the court.

"She really brought a lot of excitement and confidence to the rest of us," Harris said.

Patterson said the individual performance personifies her team's mental attitude since the time of Finkes' injury just more than two weeks ago.

"I think it illustrates the toughness and character that this team has possessed over the course of the last five games," Patterson said.

Finkes said missing the critical stretch was hard but that Saturday's performance makes it a lot easier to forget.

"It was killer to see my team out there struggling when I wasn't out there," Finkes said. "To just sit and not be able to do anything about it but give them words was tough."

Finkes said having to sit out made her realize that it is important to seize every opportunity.

"I think it made coming back 10 times better. It pumped everybody up," Finkes said. "It made me realize that things aren't always like you want them to be, so you have to take advantage of what you have."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Both the men's and women's 1999 Big 12 Tournament brackets have been set as the 1998-99 regular basketball season wound down Saturday and Sunday.

After a disappointing 69-60 loss to Colorado in Boulder, Colo., on Saturday, the K-State men have earned the seventh seed in the tournament and will take on 10th-seed Texas A&M at 6 p.m. Thursday at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

The Wildcats will look to get revenge for their 79-74 loss to the Aggies in College Station, Texas, on Feb. 10.

If the Wildcats defeat the Aggies, they will play second-seeded Missouri, which K-State did not beat in two meetings this season. The second round will start at 6 p.m. Friday.

Going into the Big 12 Tournament, the K-State women's basketball team is coming off an emotional 69-58 victory against rival Kansas on Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum in the team's last regular home game of the season.

K-State is the eighth seed in the tournament and will face Colorado at noon Tuesday at the Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo. K-State beat Colorado in Boulder, Colo., on Feb. 6, 59-57, but lost at home 57-54 to the Buffaloes on Feb. 17.

The Wildcats will face first-seed Texas Tech at noon Wednesday if they defeat the Buffaloes for the second time this season.

K-State lost to the Red Raiders in Lubbock, Texas, 73-60 Jan. 9.

Tickets for the men's and women's tournament are still available through the K-State Ticket Office. All-session tickets for the men's tournament are available for $180, but no single-session tickets are for sale.

Men fall to Buffs despite late rally

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOULDER, Colo. — Kenny Price scored 18 points and Jamahl Mosley added 17 in Colorado's 69-60 victory over K-State on Saturday, but Colorado coach Ricardo Patton said he was worried his team just about lost control in the second half.

"When they went to their zone defense, it stagnated our offense," Patton said. "They did a good job of placing the zone in, challenging us to make the shot from the perimeter."

K-State was looking at a 20-point deficit at 48-28 with about 14 minutes left when the team changed its defense strategy. Eight minutes later, the lead was still 16 points at 63-47, but then K-State started off on a 13-2 run, which ended at 65-60 with 1:21 left.

The game was the fourth-straight conference win for Colorado, only the second since 1973. Even the win, which left the Buffs 16-13 overall and 7-9 in the Big 12 Conference, doesn't leave Patton with a high level of confidence going into Thursday's opening round of the Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City, Mo.

"I wish I could remember the definition of momentum," he said. "I read something about it the other day and it basically said that it's nothing. We play next Thursday. It will be a tough game. I don't think that momentum is a factor ever."

K-State coach Tom Asbury said his team wasn't knocking down shots.

"We just couldn't execute, and we weren't very efficient," he said.

Mosley finished with 11 rebounds in the game that ended the regular season for both Colorado and K-State, which is 18-11 overall and 7-9 in conference play.

Colorado built a 34-23 halftime lead, and its biggest lead came with about 14 minutes left, at 48-28. After K-State's rally closed the margin to five, the Buffs then finished up with four more free throws.

K-State's top scorers were Manny Dies, Cortez Groves and Ty Sims, with eight apiece.

Team 10K, soda bother columnist

It looks like Team 10,000 was short of its goal on Saturday. The group of three students who make up Team 10,000 (hereafter referred to by the trendy acronym T10K) wanted to set a new attendance record for the K-State Women's basketball team.

The goal was 10,000. The reality was 8,015.

Now don't get me wrong, I'm a big fan of the women's team. In fact, I was one of the 8,015. The women played great on Saturday and should be proud of their win over Kansas.

But I didn't like some of the ways that T10K was trying to attract a crowd. Team member Ryan Crowell suggested that if you were a "big" K-State fan you had to prove it by going to the game.

Here's my beef with Crowell — don't try and guilt me into attending a game. It won't work. I don't have to attend every sporting event to be a fan. Here's a good question for him: Where were you when the K-State baseball team took on the York Panthers in its home opener?

Now there's a team that could use some help with attendance. The baseball team doesn't need a Team 10,000. It probably would settle for a Team 50. The crowds at the games are embarrassingly small. Show your school spirit by supporting a team that needs it.

■ Is it just me or is everyone sick and tired of ESPN's coverage of its Extreme Sports? What's so extreme about these games, anyway? If you stripped naked, lit yourself on fire and yelled obscenities at Latrell Sprewell while poking a large bear in the eye with a sharp stick I would label you "extreme." Riding your BMX on a course of ramps sounds like how I spent my fifth-grade summer.

■ Who decided that drinking Mountain Dew made you an "extreme" kinda guy? Drinking a can of Mountain Dew is roughly equivalent to drinking a couple cups of coffee, which makes you about as extreme as my dad, who can put back an eight-cup pot of joe in less than 15 minutes. Not something I'd be real proud of.

I just don't have a fascination with watching a tattooed high-school dropout race around on in-line skates.

■ There is no way that Scottie Pippen is going to win an NBA championship in Houston unless the team makes some significant changes. The problem is that Houston's lineup has three future hall-of-famers — Charles Barkley, Hakeem Olajuwon and Pippen — and not one of them is willing to give up the ball. These guys are averaging a little over three assists per game. They don't pass.

Pippen moved to Houston with the hopes of doing something that Michael Jordan couldn't do — win a seventh ring. It's not going to happen. It looks like the league's ugliest player will be the league's most disappointed player on the league's most disappointing team.

■ The Duke Blue Devils will annihilate any team they face in the NCAA Tournament. They're the New York Yankees of college basketball.

Anything less than a national championship will be a disappointment.

If a team is going to beat Duke, it is going to have to be an extremely physical team that can beat the Blue Devils in rebounding. I don't see a team in the field of 64 that has that potential.

Saturday night, the Blue Devils dismantled the North Carolina Tar Heels. Duke scorched the Heels in rebounding, winning the battle 52-36. Note to players: You can't let Duke get offensive rebounds. If they get a second chance at the basket, they'll make you pay. Just ask the guys in Chapel Hill.

■ I thought the Royals looked dismal last week. This week they look downright disgraceful. General Manager Herk Robinson wants to trade starting pitcher Kevin Appier, the only member of the starting rotation who has proven himself. Next thing you know, they'll be working team mascot Sluggrr into the pitching staff.

The team also is looking to unload first baseman Jeff King. Without King, the infield will lack the little things like experience, ability and talent.

Herk said he has built a team that is much more solid defensively than last year's team. The problem is that he is sacrificing virtually every hint of offense for a little more defense. What that means in reality is that instead of losing by scores of 10-3, the Royals will lose by scores of 7-0.

What does this all mean for the Royals? Never trust a man named Herk.

Tennis team loses to No. 29 New Mexico

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team lost 6-3 to a talented No. 29 New Mexico team Saturday at the Cottonwood Racket Club in Manhattan.

Despite the loss, head coach Steve Bietau said he was pleased with the overall performance of the team.

"There were definitely some bright spots," he said. "Martina played well. I thought Alena, for her first singles match back, played very well."

Sophomore Martina Pospisilova and freshman Alena Jecminkova were the only Cats to win in singles play. Pospisilova defeated Joanne Shortall 6-4, 6-1, in a rematch of last year's NCAA Tournament match that Pospisilova won. Playing at No. 2 singles, Pospisilova (3-6) played the type of game Bietau said he wanted.

"Martina played a more offensive match, which is what we have been trying to get her to do," Bietau said.

Jecminkova (1-2) played her first singles match in more than a month because of ankle problems and defeated Dominika Gerwin 7-5, 3-6, 7-6 (7-4) in a match that took well over two hours.

Bietau said he was happy to have her back in the singles line-up.

"She proved the stability of her ankle," he said. "That was nice to see."

Anna Pampoulova, who played in her first No. 1 singles match this spring, lost to Ana Friganovic 6-0, 3-6, 6-0.

"In the beginning, I was nervous because Friganovic is very good," Pampoulova said. "She has a very good serve."

Despite being shut out in the first set, Pampoulova settled down and started playing better in the second set.

"I got into my game," she said. "In the third set, I should have been more aggressive."

"Anna got overpowered," Bietau said. "She really didn't have an answer for Friganovic's serve."

The Wildcats lost the other three singles matches. Kathy Chuda had her 3-game winning streak snapped in a 6-4, 6-1 loss to Aimee Hites. Eva Novotna lost 6-2, 6-2 against Natalia Alekhova, while Natalia Farmer was defeated by Neza Kurnik 6-4, 7-6 (7-5).

In doubles, Pospisilova and Chuda picked up their third win of the season 8-4 over Friganovic and Shortall. The Cats suffered costly setbacks in the other two doubles matches. Pampoulova and Jecminkova lost 8-1 to Hites and Gerwin. The No. 3 team of Novotna and Farmer fell 8-1 to Alekhova and Courtney Choate.

Bietau said he was upset with the doubles play.

The Wildcats (2-7) hit the road for the next month. Their first conference test of the season is against Iowa State on Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

IT'S THE ROPES AND THE REINS

A cowboy waits behind the chutes before the bareback riding event begins in the short go-round Sunday in Weber Arena.

Bull fighters take stage at rodeo

The bull charges around the arena, snorting and pawing the ground. Its nostrils flare, and its tail swings back and forth like a giant, frayed rope. As it lowers its head, everyone on the arena floor races to get out of the way of the huge, ivory-colored horns.

Except for two men in cut-off overalls who wave their arms, daring the bull to come after them.

Perhaps it's the bright orange, red and yellow patterns in their clothing. Perhaps it's the white face paint that shapes their mouths into permanent smiles. Or maybe it's the many handkerchiefs hanging from their belts. Whatever it is, it catches the eye of the animal. The bull charges after the two men, who lead it to a pen, away from the cowboys in the arena.

"A lot of people call us crazy," said Larry Deges, bullfighter at the KSU Rodeo. "But you've got less of a chance to get hurt in what we do than what football players do. It's all technique."

Deges, from Pittsburg, Kan., travels the country as a bullfighter, or rodeo clown as he commonly is called. He, along with Aaron Loewe from Shelby, Neb., worked at the three rodeo performances at the K-State Rodeo on Friday and Saturday, as well as the finals on Sunday. The rodeo was in Weber Arena.

Loewe said technique is what has saved the lives of many cowboys who have been thrown from a bull. During the bullriding competition, the clown's job is to divert the bull's attention, so it doesn't charge the rider or others in the arena. He said the secret is to get in front of the bull when its back hooves are in the air.

"If you look, when I'm standing closest to the bull, his back hooves are up," Loewe said. "When he's up like that, he can't get at me."

The clowns, with their rainbow-colored shirts and oversized Wrangler overalls, entertain the crowd by making fun of the cowboys and joking with audience members throughout the show.

The costumes the two wear attract attention because of their bright colors and ill-fitting styles. From the worn, yellow Reebok shoes to his tie-dyed necktie, Loewe said he has special outfits for each performance.

"I'm very superstitious about what I wear," Loewe said after the Friday night performance. "Larry was laughing at me today because I didn't do too well this morning, so I was getting out all my lucky stuff."

The two said sometimes they need more than luck to keep themselves safe on the job. Both wear padded, blue vests under their shirts to protect them from the bulls.

"I'm more picky about my routine and preparing that than what I wear," Deges said.

The clowns were not the only ones at the rodeo for the protection of the competitors. As a rodeo pickup man, Jeff Rector's job was to get the competitors safely off their horses in the horse-riding competitions.

For the past four years, Rector, jun-

In addition, the planners recommended the standard red and blue Wal-Mart designs not be used on the building, in favor of more earth tones and shank shingles on the roof to match the surrounding architecture.

But these suggestions wouldn't fix the problems, Horton said.

"The only changes they mitigated would be cosmetic at best. There will be no effect on overall size and proximity," she said.

The association isn't opposed to developing the area, Horton said, but the supercenter will cause property values to drop, hurting owners and the city.

"If Wal-Mart came into a dead area, would nice houses spring up? If our property values drop, (the city) will lose money in property taxes," she said.

The group has circulated petitions since it formed, Horton said, and has already collected over 800 signatures.

John and Pat Johannes, also association members, said one of their concerns was the single formal exit and entrance for the center.

"What we would see would be an influx in traffic. We're concerned about the traffic," John Johannes said.

People will look for a way to avoid the stoplights between Seth Childs Road and the Shuss Road entrance/exit, taking Warner Park and Arbor roads to get around them, he said.

Horton said the group is trying to look at communities that have already had supercenters before the next meeting as a possible presentation to the board.

"The one thing we don't want to do is present a lot of information we've already presented. We don't want to ramble on," she said.

Joseph Knopp, local counsel for Wal-Mart and the current owner of the site, said he plans to bring a landscaper to the next meeting. The landscaper will have a plan to transplant cedar trees from the western end of the development to further screen the house closest to the loading dock.

Knopp also said he wants to remedy concerns about traffic detouring through Arbor and Warner Park roads with anything from an "emergency only" gate to 20 mph speed limit signs at the entrance to the roads.

The proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter, a 153,085-square-foot building, would sit on the empty lot near the junction of Seth Childs Road, left, and Ft. Riley Boulevard, bottom. The 24-hour supercenter would provide the same services as the current Manhattan Wal-Mart, plus a grocery store.

"I don't have any problem with that at all," Knopp said.

He also said he was willing to listen to all of the planners' recommendations. However, Knopp said most of the other complaints have no basis.

"It's easy to be anti-Wal-Mart. I'm just asking for the public to be fair," Knopp said.

The plans negate many of the eyesore objections, Knopp said. Most of the houses on Warner Park are one hill and several buffering trees away from the supercenter, and the store will sit below the residents' line of sight, he said.

"To say it affects them is the same as saying the country club is affected by Industrial Park," Knopp said.

As for property values dropping, Knopp said the area has been zoned as a commercial area for 25 years, something buyers were made aware of.

Knopp said most of the complaints have been based on personal hunches with a lack of hard evidence from reputable engineers or planners.

"No one with any credentials is willing to sign anything saying this is a problem," he said.

Keith Morris, director of community affairs for Wal-Mart, said the proposal retains more than 40 percent of the area's green space, more than if several smaller businesses moved in. In addition, Wal-Mart is willing to foot the bill for road improvements, trees or other improvements, he said.

Downtown Tradition

Debate over the supercenter also spills into areas across town. Carolyn Anderson founded the neighborhood association partially as a businessperson. The former owner of Pets-N-Stuff said she thinks Wal-Mart would unfairly tip the playing field against the Village Plaza and Westloop shopping centers.

"Wal-Mart is not competition for the little guy. It crushes the little guy. You can treat your customers just fine and dandy, and Wal-Mart can undercut you. As far as I'm concerned, it's dirty pool," Anderson said.

Many businesses in particular are afraid of speaking up against Wal-Mart because it would make them look afraid of fair competition, Anderson said.

"But since I no longer own my small business, I'm not afraid to talk," she said.

Knopp said the grocery component of the center would compete mainly with Dillon stores and Food 4 Less, both owned by out-of-town companies. The retail section might provide a "synergy" on the west side of town and bring businesses to spring up around it, he said.

Knopp said the center will bring in an estimated $150,000 in annual property taxes and $30 million in annual sales.

The downtown area was mentioned many times by supporters and opposition alike in the February meeting as an area endangered by the supercenter.

Scott Morrill, project manager for Manhattan Mainstreet Inc., said feelings from downtown are mixed — some support the center and others oppose it. It's tough to make a sure judgment with retail business, he said.

"Retail business trends are trendy, and they're very complex. The conditions that exist in downtown don't exist anywhere else in the world," Morrill said.

Morrill said Wal-Mart isn't the only issue that will affect downtown. The city is already conducting a study on the future of the downtown, as well as transportation and housing, he said. It's also the other studies that will decide if the downtown adds or loses pieces in the future, Morrill said.

"The current discussion is a great example of why it's important to participate. All I'm saying is there's a real opportunity to set the table for the next 20 years," Morrill said.

Eileen Meyer, manager of Streetside

Records and president of the Aggieville Business Association, said local business owners are following the issue but not in large groups.

"I think a lot of people are handling this on their own as citizens and not as businesses. That's just my guess," Meyer said.

Meyer said she wasn't concerned about a new store's effect on Streetside.

"I fight Wal-Mart everyday, and I win. I offer something they can't. I know my customers' names or at least I try to," she said.

If the supercenter is approved, Sam Devinki, managing member for Devinki Real Estate, said people need to keep track of the existing Wal-Mart. When Dillons store moved out of its location (now housing Staples) next to Wal-Mart, it left the building vacant for two years, Devinki, whose company owns both buildings, said.

Unless the city makes some clause requiring Wal-Mart to make a sincere effort to keep both stores running, nothing would prevent the company from abandoning the older building but keeping other businesses from moving in, he said.

"Keep it or let someone else in so it doesn't become a dark spot. I have no gripe with Wal-Mart. Where I have a problem is when they use that power to restrict trade," Devinki said.

Morris said there are no plans to close the existing store whatsoever because of its high success. Nationwide, 150 supercenters are expected to open before Jan. 31, 2000, Morris said. One current Wal-Mart in Salina is scheduled to be converted by next fall.

Environmental Concerns

The environmental effect of the Wal-Mart is cloudy at present. Earlier concerns included the safety of the Topeka shiner, a small minnow-size fish living in small prairie or former prairie streams like those in Wildcat Creek.

However, the Wal-Mart doesn't seem to pose an immediate threat to the shiner, listed as endangered since Jan. 14, Vernon Tabor, biologist with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, said.

The fish's habitat seems to have already moved farther up on the creek toward Fort Riley, away from what the center would affect, he said.

"You can't impact them if they don't live there," he said.

According to the city planners' report, the site proposal included an extensive plan to control erosion during the construction period, and the area will have lower rates of run-off after development than in its current state.

But that could pose its own threat to the shiner, graduate student in geography Ted Payne said. Paving the site reduces run-off in terms of erosion but also prevents it from absorbing rainwater, perhaps so much that the designed basins might not hold it all, he said.

Heavy rains can fill the shiner habitat to the west with eroded silt, or droughts could dry it up.

Both cases would force the fish east, he said. Adding another business to the industrial corridor in the middle will make that migration more difficult, he said.

Payne began an environmental impact study after the February meeting through the Geographical Information Study, a class that teaches the software for studying changes in land over time.

Payne said extra water flow caused by both the supercenter and the planned Law Enforcement Center across the road will affect a circular stretch of Wildcat Creek to the east. Increased water flow could gouge out land under the jail site, Payne said.

who has been at the forefront of such issues as campaign finance reform, tax relief and tobacco regulation.

"He is highly respected by his colleagues," Reagan said. "He is one of the movers of the Senate."

McCain has formed a presidential exploratory committee to look into the possibility of seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 2000. He has not made a formal decision on his candidacy.

He is in his third term in the Senate where he is chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and serves on the Armed Services and Indian Affairs committees. He first was elected to the Senate in 1986 after two terms in the U.S. House of Representatives from 1982-86. McCain also has served as chairman of the International Republican Institute since 1993.

McCain is a decorated Navy pilot. His many military honors include the Silver Star, Bronze Star, Legion of Merit, Purple Heart and Distinguished Flying Cross.

He graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy and served 22 years in the Navy, including more than five years as a prisoner of war in Vietnam after his plane was shot down.

"We are most pleased that Sen. McCain has accepted our invitation to deliver the 114th Landon Lecture," Reagan said. "Students could benefit by listening to one of the most important senators, a major political figure and possibly a future president."

McCain will be the second Landon Lecturer of the 1999 spring semester. Former Sen. Howard Baker will deliver the 113th Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. March 9 in McCain. Both lecturers can be heard live on the Internet at www.dce.ksu.edu/landon. "The best thing is watching the animals do what they love to do, and being out there, being a part of it," he said. "You're out there in the thick of it."

Being in the thick of it has been dangerous at times, Rector said.

"I've had horses fall down with me on it," he said.

Loewe has broken his leg, gotten stitches in his eye and had teeth knocked out while working.

"This is the kind of job, where if you don't enjoy it, you're in the wrong place," Deges said. "But it's very self-satisfying."

Deges started out as a bull fighter for a rodeo in high school before he became a clown.

Both Deges and Loewe have been working as rodeo clowns for more than a decade. Sometimes, Loewe said, stepping in front of a charging animal for someone he does not know is difficult.

"A guy told me something one time, when I started fighting bulls," Loewe said.

"He said, 'The one thing you've got to be able to do is step in front of a Mack truck for someone who just walked by and called you a prick.' It's true," Loewe said.

Boggs said right after the ambulances left the scene. "When we first arrived, we thought the first one (Wooden) was code blue, which means he was going in and out. But both of them went out code red, or with life-threatening injuries."

Wooden, who arrived at the hospital at 7:15 p.m., was declared dead at 7:37.

Witnesses said the car was headed east when it went off the road and through a guard rail in front of Dick Edwards West.

Aaron Wolfe, of Manhattan, said he was driving in the left-hand lane when the car passed him on the right, then spun out of control. Wolfe said the car was going about 90 mph.

Rob Adams, of Ogden, was driving westbound and saw the accident.

"I saw him go off the road, and then I saw his headlights go up in the air. Then he fell, and all I could see was a lot of smoke," he said. "I pulled over and asked if they were all right. When I first got there, the dust hadn't even settled."

Kansas Highway Patrol officers were still investigating the scene and could not be reached for comment.

The exhibit includes covers by famed photographers, such as Annie Leibovitz, Steven Meisel and Albert Watson; video and audio presentations; original illustrations; drawings and paintings from Rolling Stone, as well as one-of-a-kind items from famous artists.

Included are pieces of Marilyn Manson's stage wear, Trent Reznor's Woodstock wardrobe and John Lennon's personal correspondence.

Klein said the exhibit periodically changes to reflect the influence of new inductees into the hall of fame and changes in rock itself.

"It represents a living history, so it does change, but of course not for every college it visits," he said. "New memorabilia is added when something comes along that we think will be of interest to students and other people who will visit the exhibit from the surrounding communities."

The exhibit was created to give college students exposure to rock's role in American culture, he said.

"The idea is to bring a living time line of rock 'n' roll memorabilia and artifacts to people all over the country," Klein said. "We don't expect people to have every issue of Rolling Stone in their personal collections, and people are certainly not going to have access to the memorabilia such as what they can see in this exhibit."

Tena Stoller, Union special events coordinator, said the exhibit sounded like something of interest to students.

"They contacted us and asked if we'd like to have it here, and it sounded like an interesting show with museum-quality exhibits, so we thought it would be a great thing to have," she said.

Stoller also said the set-up of the exhibit allows for flexibility based on personal preferences.

"People can take as much time as they want or just a little time if that's all they have between classes," she said. "The whole thing is divided into nine different sections that are all contained within a certain area, so someone can look at every section or just one or two."

"Hopefully, people will take the time to stop by and check it out when they stop by the Union for lunch or have a little free time. It will be interesting and fun, and of course, it is free."

'Hempilation 2' promotes legalization of marijuana

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Review
Music
of 5

The advocacy for the legalization of marijuana has a plethora of supporters in the entertainment industry, as is evident in the new album "Hempilation 2: Free the Weed."

The compilation of marijuana-related songs revolves around the advocacy of the legalization of marijuana, and mixes a variety of musicians and musical styles to voice its message. From Louis Armstrong's and Cab Calloway's "viper" music of the 1920s to Jefferson Airplane's "pot anthems" of the 1960s, "Hempilation 2" continues the cause of legalizing the substance.

The album, which is a sequel to the 1995 "Hempilation—Freedom is NORML," features many well-known artists and songs, such as Blue Mountain's "Mary Jane" and country singer Willie Nelson's "Me and Paul," which was recorded live in Amsterdam. The issue of legalization of marijuana is supported by artists in several genres of music, including rock, country, hip-hop and reggae.

Indeed, some of the songs in this album are the types that people sing frequently and never really know what the theme of the song is or what the lyrics mean. "Hempilation 2" effectively exposes the listener to those "mysterious" songs, such as "Mary Jane," and lets the listener in on the true meaning of these tunes.

The album begins on a positive note, "Free to Choose" by Everything, and goes into showcasing bigger names, such as George Clinton's "U.S. Custom Coast Guard Dope Dog," and adds variety in the Long Beach Dub All Stars' reggae-filled, "Under Me Sensi."

ON THE WEB
View Hempilation on the World Wide Web. Its Web site can be found at www.marijuananeeds.com

A bit of techno is even tossed in to the diverse mix of sounds, with "High," by Jimmie's Chicken Shack, a remix of the group's 1997 original version.

Bringing up the rear of the album is a unique blend of fiddle and guitar in Hank Flamingo's "The Dope Smokin' Song." The instrumentals and twang-like vocals make this song sound like a drugged-up rerun of "The Beverly Hillbillies."

Ultimately, the various sounds and musical styles of the album make it just as interesting and unique as its cause. While the issue of the legalization of marijuana is a controversial one, "Hempilation 2" tackles the subject head-on, and isn't afraid to state its views on the issue. Even if one doesn't agree with the views presented on the album, one is bound to find a style on it that they enjoy.

Annual motorcycle show brings bikers to mall

■ 3 local businesses, RCPD display cycles at show.

By BRIAN HERNANDEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Town Center was the center of the motorcycle universe this weekend for the sixth-annual Blue Valley Riders Motorcycle Show.

Blue Valley Riders President Tammy Krumm said the show was a success.

"The show went very well this year," Krumm said. "We were unusually busy Saturday, so that was a good sign."

ON THE WEB

The Blue Valley Riders Club can be found at www.personal.ksu.edu/~rich/bvinfo.html

Overall, the numbers are what we expected both in attendance and motorcycles entered.

Sixty-three motorcycles were entered into contests during the two-day event. The bikes were grouped in eight categories: antique, classic, sport touring, open street, competition, custom and scooters.

Three local businesses — Brooks Yamaha, City Cycle Sales and Motorcycle Supply — and the Riley County Police Department also displayed motorcycles at the show, bringing the total number of bikes on display to 89.

Monty Prescott, co-chairman of the show committee, said he heard positive feedback from many of those in attendance.

"The show went extremely well," Prescott said. "Many of the people I spoke with this weekend had nothing but praise for the show. It is great when we have the opportunity to interact with the public and tell them what motorcycling is all about."

Blue Valley Riders club member Steve Monical displayed his 1996 Honda Gold Wing in the show. He said he and his wife enjoy taking long trips on their bikes for many reasons.

"Riding a motorcycle gives you such freedom," Monical said. "We use our car to get from point A to point B, but we use our motorcycles to experience getting from point A to point B. Your senses are much more alive when you are riding through the environment."

Last year, 31 club members traveled a total of 289,122 miles across North America to 52 different cities. A map of the routes traveled was on display in the mall's courtyard.

The club will have its monthly meeting at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Manhattan Carpet and Interior. Anyone interested in joining is welcome to attend.

Scenes from the Manhattan Town Center are reflected on the front of a Honda motorcycle Sunday night at the sixth-annual Blue Valley Riders Motorcycle Show. A total of 89 motorcycles were on display.

Events scheduled for Asian Awareness Month

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Asian-American Student Union and other sponsors have planned activities and events to center on "Cultures in Perspective," the theme of this year's Asian Awareness Month at K-State.

"We chose this as our theme because our culture is so diverse, and we can't just pick one," said Ria Kim, senior in human resource management, marketing and international business, and president of the Asian-American Student Union.

"We tried this time to bring in lots of Asian cultures," said Lisa Yi, senior associate director for the Office of Student Financial Assistance and adviser for the Asian-American Student Union.

Today's events include a cooking workshop at the International Student Center. Kim will teach how to prepare food Korean-style.

Most of the events celebrating Asian Awareness Month will occur in the second week of March.

A traditional dance show featuring the Filipino Dance Group is at 7:30 p.m. March 8 at the K-State Student Union Little Theatre.

"I really want people to go to one or two events to learn about Asian-American culture," Kim said.

From March 8-10 and 13-15, the Anime and Manga Society will sponsor the Anime Film Festival, which will show Japanese animation films.

Workshops and discussions regarding Asian-American awareness will be March 10-11.

Do Sup Chung, professor of biological and agricultural engineering, will be host of the workshop, "Asian-Americans: A Personal Perspective," at 4 p.m. March 10 in Union 207.

A panel discussion about Asian-American issues at the Union Courtyard is tentatively planned for March 11. Panelists and a mediator will talk about Asian vs. oriental stereotypes and experiences growing up in the United States as Asian-Americans.

Asian-Americans also deal with societal issues that affect Asians of different backgrounds, Yi said.

"We want to put at the forefront that Asians have a lot of different cultures," she said. "More so than a lot of genres of minorities."

Peggy Myo-Young Choy, a dancer and choreographer from Madison, Wis., will instruct a dance class March 12 that will teach students traditional and modern-dance techniques in Nichols Hall from 2 to 3:30 p.m.

"This is a great opportunity for the Manhattan community and students on campus to experience Asian-American culture," Kim said.

Later that night, Choy will perform at the Union Ballroom.

March 13 is the Asian-American Student Union Jam Session, a dance party starting at 8 p.m. at the International Student Center.

The activities will conclude with the movie "Rush Hour" on March 14 at Forum Hall and a workshop March 17. At the workshop, Grace Hwang, instructor of business administration, will be talking about interviewing skills and networking with people at 4 p.m. in Union 207.

The Asian-American Student Union wants this month to express the Asian-American culture, Yi said.

All the events are free except for the Taste of Asia II March 7, which will cost $2 at the door or contribution of a side dish.

"Regardless of where you are in the country, it's important to remember there are other cultures around you," Yi said. "There's always going to be a minority, and people need to be aware of that."

Each Monday the Collegian will publish a list of events scheduled for Asian American Awareness month.

SafeRide committee to present proposal to Senate chairman

By ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The SafeRide committee will present its report concerning a new transportation system to Student Senate Chair Gabe Eckert on Tuesday.

The committee was organized last September to conduct research to support a new mode of transportation for students. The program would operate in the late evening hours and allow students, if on campus late or at the bars, to get a ride home. Hours would be extended on the weekends.

Apryl Mathes, SafeRide research committee chair, said the committee's goal was to see whether there was a need for SafeRide at K-State, and how it would be implemented.

"Our research has indicated that students would be interested for such a program to start," Mathes said. "However, it is not up to the committee to recommend suggestions for the proposal. It depends on Student Senate and what they feel would be the next step."

Upcoming elections for Senate will be a factor in determining who will support the program after Senate receives it, Mathes said.

Next week, the committee will begin organizing its research and make its formal proposal to Senate.

Committee member Becky Guthrie said she and others on the committee have been going to different classes on campus to conduct surveys on the new program to find out students' opinions.

"The surveys will help us determine how people on campus will feel about the program," Guthrie said. "We go to all the colleges Monday through Friday and hand out the surveys. This enables us to target all classification of students from freshman to senior."

For the most part, the results of the research, conducted with a sample size of 400, have been in favor of the new program, Guthrie said.

Questions on the survey include where students live and if they would be willing to pay a privilege fee. The fee amount ranged from $1 to $5.

Other schools have been using the SafeRide program and have been successful, said Mike Henry, University of Kansas SafeRide committee member. KU has been satisfied with its program thus far.

"SafeRide has existed on campus for more than nine years," Henry said. "It has been established, and students have been using it on a daily basis."

Danielle Frieling, a fifth-year senior in nutrition exercise science/pre-physical therapy, has worked at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for five years. Beginning her freshman year as a volleyball and basketball official, becoming a Weightroom Supervisor her sophomore and junior years, working as an Assistant Building Manager her senior year and serving as a Fitness Consultant this year, Danielle has seen a number of facets of the Recreation Complex. Her current position at the Wellness Resource Center allows Danielle to have a positive impact on people's lives, which she views as the greatest benefit of her job. Danielle's main duties include setting up fitness programs, nutrition counseling, testing for body fat and conducting cardiovascular test. Danielle is extremely active in intramurals, and enjoys being around her peers and an atmosphere of physical activity.

Ryan Pursley is one of the Intramural Supervisors at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Ryan, a senior in biology, has worked at the Recreation Complex for four years. He worked as an official of all sports his first three years before his Intramural Supervisor position this year. Some of Ryan's responsibilities as a supervisor involve helping out the officials, setting up all the equipment in the playing areas, guiding the officials to do a better job and serving as an overall administrator for intramurals. Ryan enjoys working at the Rec mainly because he enjoys being around the people and he likes the intramural program. Says Ryan, "The intramural program gives students and faculty a chance to play sports in an organized atmosphere which they might not get to do otherwise."

Pool Action

Swimmers exercise to a different beat. Your heart is a built-in monitor for aerobic exercise. Maintaining your training heart rate for 30 minutes, three times per week increases oxygen demand, burns fat and improves cardiovascular endurance. To find your training heart rate (THR), subtract your age from 220 (maximum heart rate) and multiply by 75. However, if swimming is your means of aerobic exercise, you must subtract the average 13 beats per minute difference there is between swimmers and runners. Subtract your age plus 13 from 220 and multiply by 75. A swimmer's heart rate may be lower because of the body's horizontal position, the cooling effect of the water, or the heart not having to work as hard against gravity. Swim to a different beat and achieve the same great aerobic exercise benefits.

Nutrition Notes

There has been a lot of talk about the safety of aspartame recently. According to a scientist in the MIT Clinical Research Center, aspartame is safe for the general public. Aspartame, also known as NutraSweet, has been shown to have no adverse side effects, even in large doses. Studies were done to test mood, aggression, and various other cognitive functions as doses exceeding 20 times the amount that the general population would consume in one day. Over the 4-month test period, no changes were noted that were linked to aspartame. Thus, its safety seems to be reaffirmed.

Fitness Facts

Do you have trouble falling asleep or waking frequently in the middle of the night? If you answered yes, you may want to consider adding some brisk aerobic activity to your day. Some activities may be walking or cycling. A good time to achieve this is before breakfast or dinner. You may also use it as an excuse to go walk off dinner. Just don't walk too close to your bedtime, as it may keep you up instead of allowing better quality sleep. People who exercise on a regular basis are said to fall asleep more quickly, sleep more soundly, and wake up more refreshed.

My Favorite Workout

Working out is nothing new to Chico Crichlow. Chico has been working out since high school and continues to love it. His favorite workout is weightlifting. A K-State alumnus and current Residential Advisor for Flint Hills Job Corps, Chico can leg press 1300 pounds and bench press 315 pounds, as well as being an all around builder. One of Chico's favorite aspects of working out is the different people he works with on a regular basis. He will workout with anyone, however, "If they can't keep up, they gotta go," says Chico, who takes his weightlifting seriously. Originally from Trinidad, Chico grew up in a culture where almost everyone is into being physically fit. Chico's advice concerning working out is to not wait until you get old to start working out - do it now and you'll live a longer life.

T-Shirt Design Contest

K-State students are invited to submit their ideas for next year's intramural t-shirt design. The winner will receive $75. Entries are being accepted now through April 1, 1999, and may be turned in to the business office at the Rec Complex. For specific information about design requirements, pick up an information sheet in the Intramural Gallery or call the office at 532-6980.

Police close student's October murder case

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The investigation into the October shooting death of a K-State student was declared closed Friday by the Riley County Police Department. RCPD Sgt. Jay Mills said ballistics reports from the Kansas Bureau of Investigation confirmed that Tom Richardson, 22, freshman in business, was shot by Brent Lawless, 35, who then shot and killed himself.

The bodies were discovered in Richardson's apartment on Manhattan's west side the morning of Oct. 26, 1998.

Mills said the reason the case was closed so many months after the crime was because the RCPD was waiting to receive the KBI's reports.

"The ballistics reports determined that Lawless shot Richardson and confirmed the results of our previous investigations," Mills said.

Authorities said Lawless, a Junction City parole officer, shot Richardson twice and then fired one shot at himself.

Though investigators were able to determine what happened in Richardson's apartment, several details of the case remained unclear.

Neither the motive nor the nature of the relationship between Richardson and Lawless has been determined.

Lawless was not Richardson's parole officer as some, including Richardson's mother, speculated after the shooting. At a campus memorial service for her son, Elaine Richardson said investigators told her that was how her son met Lawless.

Last month, RCPD Lt. Herb Crosby said he wasn't sure how the two knew each other.

Mills said Monday that the RCPD confirmed Richardson and Lawless were friends but still can't determine how they met.

"We know that they were friends because they have several mutual acquaintances," Mills said.

Mills said the case was closed without determining the motive for the crime because it would be difficult to determine since both parties are dead.

The case will remain closed unless new information is discovered, he said.

"We've investigated, talked with friends and family, and we know all that we're going to know," he said. "But we can reopen the case if something new comes up."

Higher ed bill almost ready

By LEW FERGUSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A plan by House members to restructure higher education governance in Kansas should be ready in bill form within 10 days, Rep. Ralph Tanner said Monday.

It will combine elements of a recent proposal advanced by two senators and a House component to provide financial incentives aimed at getting both the state Board of Regents and community colleges to support it.

"It's going to require a great deal of vision, I think, on the part of everyone" to get a plan passed before the 1999 legislative session ends, Tanner told the Joint Advisory Committee on Governance.

Tanner, a Baldwin City Republican, is chairman of the House Education Committee.

Regents Chairman Bill Docking of Arkansas City, a member of the advisory committee, did not express an opinion on the House proposal, but he questioned whether the Legislature has enough time left to get it done this year.

Board of Education chairwoman Linda Holloway of Shawnee also did not comment on the plan Monday.

Only one thing is certain: A plan developed late last year by a task force appointed by Gov.

Bill Graves is dead, Tanner said. "Everything else is on the table," he told the advisory committee.

Tanner outlined these broad parameters of the House plan:

■ It would keep the present Board of Regents and Board of Education so no constitutional amendment would be needed to create new coordinating bodies. Community colleges would be allowed to move from the Board of Education to the regents for course and curriculum supervisory control. The community colleges would get operating grants from the state rather than credit hour aid.

■ It would specify in legislation that the regents would be divided into three subcommittees: one to run the universities, one to run the community colleges that choose to join a state system and one to provide coordination for the state's entire system of higher education.

■ It would provide financial incentives for the regents, their universities and the community colleges, initially to buy down local mill levies that help fund the two-year schools.

"My belief is it's possible to develop three divisions within the Board of Regents, assign each an appropriate staff, keep the executive

K-State celebration highlights national women's observance

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women's History Month kicks off this week, and K-State has planned several events to celebrate the occasion.

The focus of the month is to recognize the accomplishments of women worldwide, said Jackie Spears, director of the Women's Studies Program.

"The purpose of this is to recognize the important roles women have played in our culture and across the world," Spears said.

CALENDAR of EVENTS

TODAY: Women's self-defense classes will begin at 5:30 p.m. at the Women's Center. There will be classes every Tuesday and Thursday for three weeks.

MARCH 3: The International Student Center and Union Program Council will sponsor a panel discussion on "Women and Culture" at 4 p.m. in Union Station.

MARCH 4: The K-State Office of the Provost will present "Sharing Women's Ideas on Leadership" from noon to 4 p.m. in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

MARCH 5-6: The Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance will bring Augusto Boal, the founder of Theatre Oppressed, to K-State.

MARCH 9: Dolores Huerta, Ms. Magazine's 1998 Woman of the Year, will give a lecture, "Containing the Activist Spirit," in Forum Hall.

MARCH 12: The Women's Solidarity Coffeehouse at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, where guests will celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Women's Center, will be from 7 to 9 p.m.

"We want to showcase women's talents and contributions."

Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center, said visibility is achieved through Women's History Month.

"Most people know we're here, but our activities are mainly invisible," Allen said. "This is the one time a year where we can have extra visibility and schedule some fun programs and events."

One of the more publicized events this month will be the Women's Solidarity Coffeehouse from 7 to 9 p.m. on March 12 at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, where guests will celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Women's Center. Ann Butler, former director of women's studies at K-State, will be the featured speaker. Turina String Quartet, a group of local, female musicians, will entertain at the event. Admission is free and open to the public and guests are asked to dress in 1973 attire to commemorate the founding of the Women's Center.

Dolores Huerta, co-founder with Cesar Chavez of United Farm Workers, will give a lecture, "Containing the Activist Spirit," March 9 in Forum Hall.

Huerta was named Ms. Magazine's 1998 Woman of the Year.

Women's self-defense classes will begin today at 5:30 p.m. at the Women's Center. The classes will be on Tuesdays and Thursdays and last for three weeks.

On March 3, the International Student Center and Union Program Council will sponsor a panel discussion on "Women and Culture" at 4 p.m. in Union Station.

The Women's Center has accomplished much in 25 years, Allen said.

"Twenty-five years ago, there were not even policies in place to protect women's rights," she said. "K-State has been right in there with everyone else fighting. We still have a long way to go, though."

The K-State Office of the Provost will present "Sharing Women's Ideas on

IVAN KOZAR/KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brad Fenwick (left), Jerry Reynard (middle) and Carol Peak (right), members of Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board, listen as Susan Rush, support manager at the current Manhattan Wal-Mart store, explains her store's contribution to the Manhattan community. The board was hearing further public testimony after tabling the issue a month ago. Following a discussion that lasted more than four hours, the board voted 5-2 to table the issue indefinitely.

Board postpones supercenter decision

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board voted Monday night to table the controversial zoning proposal for a Wal-Mart Supercenter near the intersection of Seth Childs Road and Southwind Place for the second time.

The board voted 5-2 to table the issue and forward a list of plan recommendations to both the applicant and a concerned citizens group, with no set date for the next discussion. It was easy to see where many of the citizens at the meeting stood on the issue. Or rather, where they sat.

Much like the Feb. 1 meeting of the board, when the issue had been tabled the first time, many persons seated in the audience sported "Wal-Mart Supercenter Never next to Warner Park" stickers, but they were joined this time by supporters of the proposed 153,085-square-foot supercenter, clad in matching T-shirts with the message "Wal-Mart Always: Works for Manhattan."

Other attendees unable to find seats in the City Commission room found places in the outer room where they followed the meeting.

Board Chair Jerry Reynard repeatedly said "new ideas" as citizens came up to speak on the issue, in an attempt to avoid reshaping issues already brought up in the Feb. 1 meeting.

Despite a superficial resemblance to the earlier meeting, Monday's meeting did bring up new concerns as audience members with comments were limited to less than 10 minutes of floor time. Time was measured by Reynard's kitchen timer to keep the public comment within limits.

Bonnie Lynn-Sherow, member of the Arbor Heights-Warner Park Neighborhood Association, cited a memo to the board by Joseph Knopp, local counsel for Wal-Mart, and said Knopp accused association members of being elitist in their opposition of the store.

The group was created in October to oppose the store, and Lynn-Sherow said the board members' decisions would affect residents' quality of life.

"The citizens of Manhattan look to you to think in the long term and in their best interest," she said.

Jerry Mayo, a Clay Center, Kan., businessman representing the Clay Center Mainstreet organization, said Wal-Mart Stores Inc. already has been in court on accusations of failing to provide overtime and breaks and for counterfeiting brand-name clothing.

"This is indicative of a company that's willing to exploit its help. I think you'll see you're dealing with a company that's willing to further its bottom line, period," he said.

On the other hand, Susan Rush, support manager for the current Manhattan Wal-Mart, gave examples of Wal-Mart's activities — like the cleanup of Pillsbury Crossing and local conservation plans.

"We do try to get out there, and we do try to give back to the community," Rush said.

Ted Payne, graduate student in geography, said that regardless of the business moving in, his environmental project shows the Soldier remains in serious condition after accident

A Fort Riley soldier was transferred to the University of Kansas Medical Center and remains in serious condition after a Sunday night car accident that killed another soldier.

William Valentine was airlifted from Irwin Army Community Hospital to KU Medical Center slightly before dawn Monday morning. Hospital officials would not comment on what injuries were being treated but said he was in the surgical intensive care unit and that doctors still were evaluating him.

Officials at Irwin said Sunday that Valentine had been treated for a broken right leg and a fracture in his left arm.

The one-car accident occurred about 7 p.m. Sunday night on Fort Riley Boulevard near Manhattan Regional Airport. Valentine was driving eastbound when he lost control of the car, went through the median and a guardrail, and fell about 15 feet into a culvert.

The accident killed 19-year-old Calvin Wooden, a private at Fort Riley. He died Sunday night at Irwin Hospital from severe trauma.

Earl Stackhouse, a trooper for the Kansas Highway Patrol who was at the scene of the accident, said alcohol was not involved and both men were wearing their seat belts.

"About the only thing that was involved was speed," he said. Stackhouse declined to say exactly how fast Valentine had been driving. However, witnesses at the scene estimated that the car had been going about 90 mph.

"He just couldn't handle the car," Stackhouse said. "Let's just say they were going well over the speed limit."

Stackhouse also said charges could be brought up against Valentine. "That's something that would be decided by the county attorney once the investigation is complete," Stackhouse said. "I'm sure something will be done either through the civil attorney or through the military. Sometimes they take control over situations like this."

Stackhouse said the highway patrol most likely would be finished with its investigation by today and that it would submit information to the county attorney by the end of the week.

KU football player released from hospital after shooting

LAWRENCE — Kansas wide receiver Michael Chandler was released from the hospital Monday after a weekend shooting by masked intruders, police and hospital officials said.

Chandler left Lawrence Memorial Hospital on Monday morning where he had surgery for a gunshot wound in the groin area. He was beaten and shot about 5 a.m. Saturday after answering a knock at the door of his off-campus town home and encountering three men wearing masks.

"Michael is going to spend a few days at home resting before returning to KU later this week," said Chandler's father, Ron Williams.

Police haven't been able to conduct a thorough interview with Chandler yet, Sgt. Richard Nickell said Monday morning.

Kansas head coach Terry Allen was with Chandler, 22, when he went into surgery. Hospital spokeswoman Janice Early-Weas said the hospital had received more than 40 telephone calls Sunday from teammates, friends, coaches and the news media about Chandler's condition.

No arrests had been made as of Monday, and police said they had no suspects.

Democratic leaders attempt revival of oil-industry aid

TOPEKA — Two Democratic leaders are trying to revive interest in a series of bills to help the state's struggling oil producers.

The bills would eliminate the mineral severance tax on oil, exempt oil producers' purchases of machinery and equipment from the state sales tax, and give small production companies income tax credits to offset their property taxes.

Together, they could save the state's oil producers about $18 million a year.

"These are real Kansans out there trying to make a living and support their families, and they're in a world of hurt," House Minority Leader Jim Garner of Coffeyville said.

18-year-old shoots man, dies of apparent suicide

DODGE CITY, Kan. — An 18-year-old man who shot an acquaintance before forcing another man at gunpoint to drive him from the crime scene was shot by police in this southwest Kansas town.

The wounded suspect fell to the ground late Sunday, then shot himself in the head in an apparent suicide attempt, police said. He died later at a Wichita hospital.

1 fatality, 2 injuries after U.S. bombs Iraq oil pipeline

MOSUL, Iraq — American warplanes struck northern Iraq again on Monday, and Iraqi officials said an oil pipeline knocked out by weekend bombing could be back in operation in a few days.

U.S. Air Force jets dropped more than 30 bombs on Iraqi military installations Monday, a U.S. military official said. The bombing came after the F-15 fighters were targeted by Iraqi radar near Mosul, Air Force Capt. Mike Blass of the U.S. European Command said. He said damage was being assessed.

In Baghdad, the official Iraqi News Agency reported that the U.S. warplanes damaged "another circle in the control system of the operations of the Iraq-Turkey pipeline," for the second time in two days.

Iraqi officials said Sunday's U.S. strikes hit the power station and communications center for a pipeline about 25 miles from Mosul, cutting off the flow of Iraqi oil to Turkey. Iraq said one person died and two were wounded.

Retired general wins office despite fraud allegations

ABUJA, Nigeria — A retired general who 20 years ago stepped down as the head of a military junta was declared the winner Monday of Nigeria's presidential elections amid allegations of fraud.

The election won by former Gen. Olusegun Obasanjo had been billed as the final step in a return to democracy for Africa's most populous country.

Election monitors from the United States found flaws in the electoral process, including inflated vote returns, ballot box stuffing and altered results.

Leo Prieto (left), junior in pre-law and Spanish, and Chris Bainter, junior in computer engineering, say they are going to try to listen to everyone's concerns if they are elected to lead the Student Governing Association. Both Prieto and Bainter have leadership experience with SGA.

Good listeners equal good leaders

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Good leaders have to be good listeners, and Leo Prieto and Chris Bainter said they think they fit this description.

Prieto, junior in pre-law and Spanish, and Bainter, junior in computer engineering, said they are going to try to listen to everyone's concerns and be genuine.

"We're in this to serve the students," Prieto said. "We think we bring this campus together."

Prieto said he and Bainter's leadership positions have given them the experience they need to lead this campus.

Both Prieto and Bainter were Student Senate interns and then senators for their colleges. Prieto also has been the multicultural ambassador coordinator, Hispanic American Leadership Organization president and international affairs director on current Student Body President Tracey Mann's cabinet. Bainter has served as president of his fraternity, parking and campus safety director on Mann's cabinet, student representative on the University Parking Council and college relations director for the College of Engineering.

"Our diverse leadership capacities that we have, as well as our knowledge of issues and service to Student Senate make us kind of a unique team," Prieto said.

Prieto and Bainter said they're running a platform for student body president and vice president based on knowledge, service and unity.

The first issue on their platform is mandatory rental inspections. Prieto said rental inspection is a problem that's been around a long time, and all they are asking for is minimal code regulations for K-State students who live off campus.

Many other Big 12 Conference schools already have mandatory rental inspections, Prieto said.

Prieto said Manhattan needs to be held responsible for safe housing. A lot of housing that students live in has been around a long time, and little problems can turn into big things, he said.

"The reason we feel so passionate about this is because usually people don't do anything about this until a tragedy happens," Prieto said. "We're moving into the 21st century, and we can't be living in substandard housing."

Prieto and Bainter's second issue deals with implementing a citywide transportation system and a SafeRide program. Bainter said he believes K-State doesn't have a parking problem but a congestion problem that a citywide transportation system could alleviate.

"We want to try to decrease traffic on campus during the day and increase safety on the streets at night," he said.

Bainter said it's a misconception that SafeRide is considered only as a designated-driver taxi. He said it also could be used where the Wildcat Walk escort service doesn't reach. If students are studying at a friend's house and don't have a ride home, they can call SafeRide.

Opposition to a SafeRide program perceive it to encourage drinking, Bainter said. But, he and Prieto said they disagree.

"This promotes responsibility, if anything," Prieto said.

Bainter said he and Prieto are hoping some of the funding for both programs would come from the city so a privilege fee or tuition increase wouldn't be implemented. But, if students do have to help with funding, it wouldn't be much, he said.

Citywide transportation also would be beneficial to students without vehicles, especially international students, Prieto said. He said a friend who was staying with him from Paraguay couldn't believe Manhattan didn't have a transportation system.

The third issue Prieto and Bainter would focus on, if elected, is a coalition initiative.

This initiative involves bringing together all social organizations and living organizations, on and off campus, to plan events.

Prieto said students aren't aware of all the opportunities available to them at K-State and hopefully, bringing together all the organizations would make students more aware of opportunities, more unified and break down stereotypes.

One of their ideas is to have a page in the Collegian similar to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex page.

It would include brief biographies about what different organizations are doing.

A second part of this initiative is a practicable course work program to prepare students for diversity in the work force.

"We're not out to make anything mandatory," Prieto said. "We just want to prepare graduates for the real world. You have to know how to interact with people."

Prieto and Bainter said they are the best people for the job of student body president and vice president.

"Chris and I have the ability to represent people from all walks of life," Prieto said. "We have the ability to make a positive impact on this campus, to utilize all the resources and get things done."

Collegian sets policy for election coverage

Elections for Student Governing Association start Monday and last until March 10. Between now and then, students should try to learn as much as possible about the candidates.

The Collegian will be trying to help students out by running as much information as possible before the elections, culminating with the annual Collegian Voters' Guide.

Each day, the Collegian will print profiles of presidential candidates on page 3, as well as columns from those candidates on page 4. The profiles hopefully will give you an unbiased look into how the candidates plan to make K-State better next year, while the columns will allow the candidates to explain their platforms in their own words. If you miss an issue of the Collegian, you can look up the archived stories online at collegian.ksu.edu.

Starting Wednesday, the Collegian also will print stories about issues that the editorial board thought were relevant for the upcoming elections, including the development of SafeRide, the implementation of a city transportation program and the creation of a fall break. These stories are designed to give background information to students when determining whether they agree with candidates' stances.

Those stances will be spelled out in the Collegian Voters' Guide, which comes out Monday. The guide will allow students running for student body president and vice president, Student Senate, Union Governing Board, the Fine Arts Council and the Board of Student Publications to voice their ideas for the upcoming year. The guide also will allow readers to find out where the candidates stand on the three aforementioned issues.

Also on Monday, the Collegian will be printing relevant information from candidates' expenditure reports so students can know how candidates are spending their money.

Finally, the Collegian will cover all presidential debates. So far, the scheduled debates are at 7:30 p.m. tonight in the Derby Dining Center and from noon to 1 p.m. Friday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

The Collegian is concerned about making sure readers know enough about candidates to make an informed decision when voting. If you have any ideas or questions, please feel free to contact us either by phone 532-6556 or by e-mail at collegian@ksu.edu.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

I've got two words for the greek people—ignorant.

To those of you who don't like the officials at the Rec—One, get a life, because it's just an intramural basketball game. And two, if you don't like it, there's an office right as you go in—you can sign up to ref there.

Yeah, I'm a greek, and I just wanted to say to whoever said that about the Nintendo controllers, you just made us all look like idiots. Thanks a lot.

I want to applaud Danedri Thompson for saying what the other 80 percent of campus has been saying about greeks.

After conducting a survey of 13 K-State independents, I found that none of them are envious of the greek system. All 13 are just disgusted at the blatant generalization of individuals based on living arrangements.

Fletcher Jacobs is the best writer in the whole paper.

The expository writing program at K-State should be abolished.

I'd really like to see the crossword moved up a couple of inches on the page. It would be much easier to fold the paper and put it on my desk.

I just wanted to comment about the article on Team 10,000. If you had put the time in there, people might try to show up.

Is it just me or are there more holes in Anderson since they started construction?

FALLING DOWN

People should keep from going down the slippery slide of apathy

The idiot who tripped and fell in that giant pothole on Vattier Street several weeks ago was me. Something struck me as strange about the entire incident, and it has been bothering me ever since.

I wasn't surprised to find potholes on Vattier Street. The fact that I tripped wasn't odd, either. I make it a point to fall and injure myself at least once every semester. No, what really was strange about the moments I spent lying in the middle of the street was that almost 20 people marched right past me. Surely there was a good reason why no one stopped to help or ask if I was OK.

Maybe they didn't see me step off the curb wearing a bright yellow sweater in broad daylight and tumble face flat into the middle of the street. Or, maybe they thought it was a Saturday or Sunday morning, in which case they might have mistaken me for some passed-out drunk. They might have been psychic greeks who recognized me as the angry, bitter columnist who would one day attack their system. Or, maybe they were compassionate and wanted to spare me some embarrassment by ignoring the fact that I lay bleeding in the street. Let me assure you, however, that once you have fallen flat on your face in front of a bunch of strangers there is nothing anyone can do to embarrass you further.

Obviously, I would like to forget this whole thing ever happened and save those who ignored me on that day the shame they surely are feeling as they read this. I can't do that because the incident illustrates a growing and frightening trend—a new kind of apathy.

Apathy, or not caring, is a trend I thought only affected our voting patterns and interests in the issues that shape our world. College students are said to be full of apathy, but that is a myth we have been dispelling. Lately, this campus has been a hotbed of debate. We have debated about the radio station, the effectiveness of Tom Asbury as a coach and "The X-Files." Let's not trade one type of apathy for another, far worse kind—apathy towards our fellow man and woman. When apathy starts to affect how or if we interact with one another, it becomes a disgusting problem.

If this were New York, I would expect the type of apathy I found on that rainy morning on Vattier Street. It was in the Big Apple that a woman was stabbed to death for more than a half an hour in the middle of a street. According to The New York Times, 38 witnesses watched the attack from their apartment windows and not one helped the dying woman. No one even called the police.

But this isn't Manhattan, New York; this is the Little Apple. Most of us are Kansans or Midwesterners. We pride ourselves on being neighborly and helpful. At least, I do. K-State prides itself on being one of the friendliest schools as well.

This type of apathy in Manhattan seems to be a recent one. In prior semesters after I have taken a tumble, I always was helped off of the ground or asked if I needed help. I mention this all now, at the risk of making a fool out of myself, because I hope we realize the terrible form our apathy is taking and make a conscious effort to stop it before it gets out of hand.

I worry that things are spiraling out of control and if we are not careful, we could have a situation like the one in the Big Apple. I am concerned because I see students becoming more and more self-centered. We rush through everything we do in order to rush through the next thing, and in the process of our scuttling, we become so wrapped up in our own lives, we fail to notice those around us.

We forget that everything we do affects everyone else, and each day grants us the opportunity to affect someone in a positive way. Sometimes that only means helping someone who has fallen.

I brushed myself off after that fall. I carried a damaged ego, a sprained ankle and a bruised spirit with me to my car. It made me think we have a responsibility to one another, but some of us, and that includes me, are falling down on the job.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

SGA elections need to be interesting for the apathetic voter

Student elections are next week. For some, this is a busy part of the school year in which important decisions must be made. For people like me, this doesn't really affect us much. Being a freshman, I don't really grasp what the student elections are about.

So far, the only thing I really have learned about student elections is it means an increase of pictures of people in suits and ties announcing their candidacy. You can't pick up a paper without these people in ties. As far as I can tell, that is really all that is involved with student elections. People in ties talking about privilege fees. That is the main requirement for being eligible to run. You must have at least one picture of yourself in the Collegian in a tie talking about privilege fees.

I know, I know. It is our responsibility as the youth and future of the nation to become involved in the government process. It is our democratic right. That means starting now at the collegiate level and hopefully carrying that responsibility on past our graduation. We should care about the issues here on campus and form an opinion about which candidates can take care of those issues. But I'm going to be brutally honest. To me, this stuff is just pretty boring.

Don't get me wrong. In no way do I want to be part of the dramatic slide toward apathy our nation is slipping to in voting. I just don't get too excited about these student elections.

The things candidates are talking about are parking, student privilege fees and the library. Let's get real. These things are all important, but I can say I don't wake up every morning and wonder about where my privilege fees are spent. I would go so far to say that no matter who is voted in as the student body president, my day-to-day life is not going to be affected.

So, how do we get these casual students like me interested in student government elections? Simple—make it interesting. We need to focus on the real issues here.

Of course, I am talking about peanut vendors. Peanut vendors, you ask? Yes, peanut vendors.

When was the last time you were sitting in a large lecture class bored out of your mind and thought to yourself, "I really could use some peanuts right about now." I can't tell you how many times it has happened to me in the past week. If we had peanut vendors in our classes, that problem would be solved.

When you are regretting that decision to skip breakfast, all you can think about is hunger. You don't just want to get up and leave class, but you have that hunger. It is affecting your ability to learn. Who can focus when they have that intense yearning for peanuts? If you are reading this right now in lecture hall, try telling me that a good bag of peanuts couldn't help you right now. Be honest.

For those of you who aren't peanut lovers, we can expand. Licorice, cotton candy and of course, soft drinks. Of course, we would never condone a beer man. That would be just ridiculous. An institute of higher learning has no place for a beer man. But a cotton candy guy—what else really says "higher learning?"

When the professor's lecture starts to drag on, give a quick shout out to Mr. peanut guy. It would flat-out liven up the class. Peanuts would be zinging above students' heads. Soft drinks would be passed up and down the aisles.

Instead of distracting, I think this would actually increase attention. Those professors who enjoy talking in a monotone would be forced to change their tones to try and be heard above the shouts of "Get your peanuts right here."

We'd keep the cost relatively low, and all proceeds would go to Hale Library. Attention spans in class would go up. I'm not sure if it gets much better than that.

Think I am being ridiculous? Well, let's think about it. Talking about the lack of student interest during election time is as automatic as Stockton to Malone. According to a little research I did, it's almost the same issues every year. Sure, that might be because these issues are important, but if we want to get people really excited about voting, we need to grab their attention. How my privilege fees are spent really is an important thing. But it doesn't top my priority list in life nor the lists of many other people I know.

No one has ever come knocking on my door and asked me any questions about issues I care about. Until they do, these student government candidates probably are going to remain the people in suits and ties that talk about privilege fees.

So let's get students excited about these issues by talking about something people want—peanut vendors—and then adding something student government candidates do best—talk about privilege fees. Just like in advertising, we bring them in for the peanuts and make them stay for the privilege fees. Before you know it, people actually are (gasp) caring about voting. Democracy is saved, and the future of our country is in the good hands of people who enjoy exercising their right to vote.

Still sounds crazy, huh? Just wait. Out there somewhere, there are some people reading this. These people enjoy shaking it up. These people enjoy having their picture taken with ties and talking about privilege fees. These people are going to be our next student body president and vice president. We all know what that means. These people get a little picture of themselves in a tie every week.

Which is, as near as I can tell, the goal of student government candidates.

Fletcher is a freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications. You can e-mail him at fj1961@ksu.edu.

Prieto, Bainter call attention to transportation issue, prioritize health, safety

Our commitment to serving K-State and its students is unmatched, both in our past service and in our future plans.

Leo has served on Student Senate for the last three years as a senator for the College of Arts and Sciences and as an officer in Hispanic American Leadership Organization for the past two years. Chris also has served with Student Senate for the past three years and is the president of Sigma Nu fraternity.

Those leadership experiences have given us the knowledge to develop the fundamental goals for our term. We are diverse and clear on our campus issues. These goals are feasible and will benefit the student body significantly.

First, we must make the issue of safety and health a priority.

More than 13,000 students live off-campus, and every year an average of more than 100 students (1 percent) have their house or apartment inspected. This leaves 99 percent of the off-campus students possibly living in sub-standard housing conditions.

Not only would this service be beneficial to the well-being of those living off-campus, but it also comes at no extra cost to the students.

Second, we are calling attention to the transportation issue.

We are taking a new approach to a continuing problem. Our belief is that K-State does not have a parking problem but a congestion problem. We want to decrease traffic during the day and increase safety on the roads at night.

We support the public transportation system that has been researched and recommended by several campus and past community officials, as well as incorporating a SafeRide program.

Finally, we will begin the Coalition Initiative.

This is a grassroots effort to promote club memberships, social networking and cohesive event planning by linking living organizations together. This can be accomplished through creation of a leadership coalition of all groups on campus, in order to utilize each other's diverse leadership capacities.

In addition, we are in support of working with the administration to include practical course work that will prepare every K-State student for the globalization of our diversified work force.

We believe our credible background and experiences speak for themselves.

Our sincere desire to create a positive and impacting change that fits the needs of every K-State student is unquestionable. As qualified candidates, we take on the role of being good listeners, in order to truly serve the students. We feel there is a need to unify students from all walks of life to develop a vision for the future of K-State cooperatively.

The potential is here, and our diverse perspectives will be utilized to keep an open mind for the betterment of our campus and our community as we gear up to lead K-State into the 21st century.

GAME NOTES

Colorado leads the all-time series 26-16, but the teams split two meetings this season. The winner of this first-round game will face No. 1 seed Texas Tech at noon on Wednesday. The Cats are hoping to win its opening tournament game for the third straight season. Saturday's crowd of 8,015 was a season high and the second-largest crowd in school history.

Women's basketball catches March Madness

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

March Madness begins today for the K-State women's basketball team.

The Cats, 14-12 in the regular season and 7-9 in conference play, take on the Colorado Buffaloes, 14-12 in the regular season and 7-9 in conference play, in the opening round of the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

The teams' identical records have earned them the eighth and ninth seeds for the tournament. They will play at noon at Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo.

K-State coach Deb Patterson said the team has established some momentum as it enters the game with Colorado.

"I think we will go into that tournament with momentum," Patterson said. "But also the mental and physical discipline necessary to compete well in the Big 12 Tournament."

The Cats have split their regular-season series with Colorado, with each team taking a game.

In their first meeting, the Cats won in Colorado 59-57 on a late Kristin Rethman three-pointer. In the second meeting, the Cats were unable to hit critical free throws in the game's final minutes, and Colorado picked up the victory 57-54.

K-State is playing a Colorado team that has been led by a variety of players this season. In 26 regular-season games, 10 different players have led the team in scoring. The overall top scorer for the Buffs this season is guard Linda Lappe, who has averaged 11.1 points per game.

The winner of the game today will take on top-seeded Texas Tech, who finished the regular season 25-3 and 14-2 in conference play.

The Cats, after an inconsistent regular season, appear to have fallen into a rhythm recently after finishing the regular season Saturday in a victory over No. 22 Kansas, 69-58.

The Cats were led by junior Angie Finkes, who had a career-high 28 points and set a school record for field-goal percentage. She shot 12 of 15 for 80 percent against KU.

The win, Finkes said, gives the team a positive energy heading into the postseason tournament.

"I think this game is gonna give us tons of momentum going into the Big 12 Tournament," Finkes said. "The last four games were kind of downers. We got blown out, but this proves to us that we are good enough to go into the Big

Seiler shoots for world mark

Renetta Seiler sets personal best, tops NCAA in women's weight throw

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior women's weight thrower Renetta Seiler wants to challenge the world-record holder someday.

Seiler, along with junior Anna Whitham, got a start toward achieving that goal when they traveled to Atlanta for the USA Indoor Meet.

The meet was open to any track-and-field athlete who is a U.S. citizen. Seiler placed second behind the world- and American-record holder, which motivated her to accomplish a season personal record.

"Throwing against her motivates me to throw a little bit hard," Seiler said. "There was a lot of competition around my distance, so that keeps me ready, because in normal meets during the season, Anna Whitham and I just compete against each other. This meet gives me a chance to throw against a lot of throwers in the mid-60s."

Seiler's throw was a distance of 68 feet, 11 3/4 inches, while Whitham placed sixth with a throw of 63 feet, 7 3/4 inches. The two took the top-two collegiate places. Seiler now is ranked No. 1 in the NCAA women's weight throw.

Head coach Cliff Rovelto said he sent his athletes to this meet mainly to help maintain the consistency that has led to his athletes' success.

ROVELTO

"Of the collegiates that were at this meet, they were the top two, so I guess it says that on that day they beat the better collegiates that were at the US National Championships," Rovelto said.

"They'd thrown well all throughout the year, and I think they'll both do well at the NCAA because of their consistency — I think they've thrown at a high level consistently."

Other track athletes traveled to the Last Chance Qualifier at Iowa State. The women's 4 x 400 meter relay ran its best time of the year, earning a provisional qualifying mark.

Aaron Lockett competed in the 60-meter dash, attempting to earn an automatic qualifying mark, while Tami Sisney competed in the weight throw with the same goal; neither improved their marks.

The Cats now are looking ahead to the NCAA meet, which will be in Indianapolis this weekend.

Both Seiler and Whitham have qualified automatically, and Seiler said she anticipated a strong showing, provided she performs at the level she has for the majority of the season.

"I've been really competitive — I knew there was going to be a lot of competition this year. I threw well, and I knew if I threw well I'd do well in the meet," Seiler said.

Baylor sweeps Cats in weekend series

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State began Big 12 Conference baseball play last weekend by being swept in a three-game series by No. 27 Baylor, dropping the Wildcats' record to 6-8 overall.

The Cats lost their first conference game of the year on Friday to the Bears, 22-6.

The Cats jumped out to an early lead in the conference opener when junior second baseman Chad Tabor led the game off with a double and scored on a two-run homer by sophomore outfielder Kasey Weishaar, his first of the season.

Baylor stormed back, scoring a total of 15 runs in the first and second innings. Senior starter Brandon Peck allowed 12 of those runs, although five were unearned as his record fell to 2-3.

"We just didn't pitch well," head coach Mike Clark said. "After the first two innings, I thought we played pretty well."

The bright spot for the Wildcats came in the form of Tabor, who finished the game with a career-high four hits, scoring two runs.

Senior closer/outfielder Andy Silva started his first game of the season after returning from a preseason automobile accident and earned his first hit of the year.

The Cats returned to the field on Saturday but were shut out by the Baylor pitching staff in a 7-0 loss.

Senior starter Derek Andersen (1-3) took the loss despite throwing on the mound for seven innings, the longest start by any K-State pitcher this year. Andersen struck out seven Bears while walking one and allowing five earned runs.

"Derek threw the ball well," Clark said. "He kept us in the ball game. That's all you can ask for."

K-State struggled at the plate against the Baylor pitchers, collecting a total of only five hits, highlighted by junior shortstop J.D. Loudabarger, who finished the game 2 for 3.

The finale on Sunday wound up as the most competitive of the series, but the Cats fell 7-6 in 10 innings.

Despite being down 6-1 after six innings, the Cats clawed their way back into the game in the seventh inning with four runs, all a result of the longball. Weishaar led the inning off with his second shot of the year and was followed by freshman third baseman/pitcher Brett Reid, who walked.

Junior third baseman Travis Andre, making his first start of the year, then planted a shot over the scoreboard in right-center field. Loudabarger finished the scoring in the inning with his first homer of the season.

Reid tied the score at six and capped the home-run fest in the top of the ninth with his second blast of the season.

Senior reliever Tim Johnson (0-1) allowed the winning run in the bottom of the 10th when senior reliever David Meares came to the mound with his inherited runners and gave up a walk with the bases loaded.

"I was real happy with the way we continued to work and execute in the game," Clark said. "Baylor's just an awfully good ball club."

The loss capped a disappointing weekend from the Wildcat pitching staff. K-State allowed a total of 36 runs in the series, while giving up a season-high 11 walks in the final game.

"We've just got to throw more strikes," Clark said. "We need to cut down on our walks a lot."

The Cats will hit the road again this weekend, playing a total of three games in the Jacksonville Kennel Classic. K-State will face Western Michigan on Friday, Xavier on Saturday and Austin Peay on Sunday before returning home March 10 to face Doane.

Miami could be surprising upset in NCAA; Duke, Michigan need wake up calls

VIEWPOINT

March is here already, and the NCAA basketball picture is beginning to take shape around the country. Six of the 64 tournament bids are now filled as March Madness officially has begun.

Charleston, Murray State and George Mason won their leagues, while the first of the three automatic bids were Samford, Winthrop and the Stanford Cardinals, who are looking for another Final Four appearance.

Charleston is going to be a team to watch in the tournament as they have seven seniors and possess the longest winning streak in the country. They are ranked 18th in the country and are in the national tournament for the third straight year. If you can remember as far back as 1997, Charleston was the team that upset Maryland in the tournament. Last season, it faced Stanford in the first round.

Of course, you have some powerhouses that have yet to play their league tournaments. No, not Colorado. I'm referring to Duke, UConn, Miami ...? Yes, Miami.

The Hurricanes have been destroying teams, including UConn. The Hurricanes are ranked 10th and join Charleston as the best teams you've never heard of.

Many people already are cutting the nets down for Duke. I have a gut feeling Duke is not going to win it all this year. They were beaten by seventh-ranked Cincinnati, and call it bad karma, but I think they will be upset somewhere along the line. If it doesn't happen, I'm not going to hop in the bathtub with a toaster, but I might throw something, just to show I care.

A few teams that are getting more attention and are exciting to watch are Auburn and Michigan State. Auburn is another one of those teams that no one thinks about even though it is 26-2 and ranked fourth. It suffered a loss last week to Arkansas, but that might not be such a bad thing.

The big-time contenders need a loss somewhere along the line for a lot of reasons. A loss can help any team regain its focus and give a wake up call to its players. Second-ranked Michigan State suffered a loss earlier this season but has coughed out 15 straight wins since then.

Some folks are citing Utah as another team to beat. After some diligent research, I have found that Utah has 19 straight wins and is eighth in the coaches' poll. Rick Majerus, the Utes head coach, is still fat and bald, thank you very much.

Some other teams that are going to be in the mix are a little more familiar to the average fan. North Carolina, UCLA and Kentucky are all middle-of-the-road teams that probably will get a few wins in the tournament but won't do significant damage.

I had some fruitcake harassing me over the weekend about how unbelievable

UCLA is going to be next year. Yawn. I tried to explain that basketball season wasn't over yet, and we still have a tournament to play. But he was so busy jabbering on, and I didn't want to get physical with him and ruin his weekend with a hospital stay. I did the only noble thing I could do. I spun on my heel and walked away, covering my ears and screaming "Blah! Blah! Blah!" It's the same thing I did to Dick Vitale for a $20 dollar bet.

As for the local teams, sorry. I don't see K-State winning the Big 12 Tournament and getting the automatic bid. If it's any consolation, I do think K-State will win its opening game against Texas A&M. I think it's a four- or five-team race in the Big 12 between Texas, Kansas, Missouri and the Oklahoma teams — probably OU, but OSU is in the hunt.

Depending on how the tournament goes, I see the Big 12 getting about four spots. Kansas will get one mostly just because it's KU, and its schedule is tough. It still is getting votes in the polls despite its losses. Texas probably will get in as well. I think it will be KU and Texas playing for the Big 12 championship this Sunday. The remaining spots are wide open for the rest of the field. The other teams are "on the bubble."

All this predicting and forecasting might not pan out to be entirely accurate, but it's a fairly good assessment of where the NCAA stands at this point. After this weekend, the insanity that is March Madness will become much more clear, and there will be enough basketball over the next few weeks to satisfy even the most hoop-starved fan.

Broadway star lights up stage in 'Show Boat'

By CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The community will have a chance to see the first modern American musical when "Show Boat" is presented by the K-State Opera Theatre at 8 tonight through Thursday at McCain Auditorium.

Based on the novel of the same name by Edna Ferber, the musical made its Broadway debut in 1927.

"Even though it is produced in the first half of the century, the audience will be able to recognize the universal struggles of the characters," said Nathan Stanton, publicity manager for the Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance.

The musical is about a family of performers on a show boat traveling up and down the Mississippi River from the 1870s to the 1920s. When the boat stops at a port, people who live near the dock come on the boat to see the family's performances, Reginald Pittman, director of the show, said.

Pittman said the melodies in the play are representative of European operettas. An operetta is a show based on light subject matter. It includes spoken dialogue and musical comedy and usually ends with a happy ending.

Pittman said he thought "Show Boat" expresses the role of black people in society during this time and their perception of how things had not changed since the Civil War.

"The audience will see how black people are treated on a daily basis from the standpoint of social class and slave labor," Stanton said.

Pittman said "Ol' Man River," a popular song from the play, expresses this theme. The character Joe, a black deckhand, sings the song, which is about the hard labor black people of that time were expected to do.

"Show Boat" will feature guest actor Andre Solomon-Glover in the role of Joe. Solomon-Glover played the role of Joe in a Broadway production and in a nationwide tour of the musical. He has made appearances as a soloist at New York's Avery Fisher Hall and Carnegie Hall and has performed with the Boston Pops as a guest soloist.

Pittman contacted Solomon-Glover about coming to K-State.

"I figured if we were going to hire someone, we should start at the top," Pittman said. "There are two men well-known for playing the role of Joe on Broadway. Andre is one of them."

Marc Maullar, managing director of K-State Opera Theatre, said she agreed.

"Andre is a real pro," Maullar said. "I think it will be wonderful for opera students to be able to work with him."

In addition to Solomon-Glover, the performance also will feature Black United Voices.

Stanton said the local group will assist with the background voices for the show.

Pittman said nearly 20 members of Black United Voices will be performing. The group is made up of students and community members.

In addition to guest performers, the cast of "Show Boat" will incorporate some of K-State's most talented students, Pittman said. Actors include students from the music and the theater departments, as well as students from other majors.

Pittman said actors in "Show Boat" will not perform a full production of the musical from the standpoint of sets and costumes.

"They will do the dialogue and interact on stage," Pittman said.

Pittman said "Show Boat" will be performed on one set with different platforms. Set designer David Tidwell created levels on the set so different scenes could be done on different parts of the set, Pittman said.

"Show Boat" is a production where the music is so good, it carries the show," he said. "The musical has several memorable songs. It is one hit song after another."

Maullar said she thought many factors contributed to the popularity of the show.

"It is very touching and exciting. The show includes a full orchestra on stage, a guest actor and Black United Voices. It will be exciting with all these elements together," she said.

Beach museum series integrates different artistic genres, classes

By DIANA LEE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Art museums can expand their repertoire to include much more than the visual arts with which they typically are associated. Through a program designed to incorporate a variety of artistic genres, the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art is doing just that.

"Arts Above the Arch," a Thursday-evening series at the Beach art museum, encompasses musical performances, literary readings, lectures and art classes.

Kathrine Schlageck, director of education and public programs at the museum, said this series is an extension of the schedules of past semesters at the museum.

"We had been doing some evening programming almost every Thursday night anyway, so we decided to make it an actual series because we had found a night that brought so many students and members of the public in," she said.

Schlageck said she wanted to add excitement to the series with a great deal of variety.

"This is an opportunity for us to integrate various areas of art, such as music, literature, artists' lectures and art classes into what we already offer," she said. "Some of the events are designed to be more academic, and others are designed to be more purely fun."

exhibitor at the Beach art museum.

She said the project has evolved from one she has been assigning for a while.

"When I was a graduate student at Indiana University, there was a wonderful art museum on campus," Dodd said. "The assignment I designed was to have them find a portrait and write imagining yourself to be that person."

She said the assignment she uses at K-State has been adapted to incorporate one of the special exhibits.

"Beach is smaller, so it has less of its permanent collection out," she said. "The Alan Shields exhibition isn't going to include many portraits, so it's important for me to be able to modify my assignments."

The art classes are instructed by Tobias Becker, art class coordinator at Varney's Book Store.

Becker said he likes to teach people how artists use the techniques and how to employ them.

"It's a really good mix to look at how the artists have done it and then play around with these techniques," he said. "They learn they can make museum quality work after we teach them the basics."

The classes are geared to teach people of all ages and skill levels.

"We're really aiming at getting everyone involved," Becker said. "We're all about the vision that art is for everyone."

Schlageck said she is glad to have found a time in the evening when busy students can find time to come to the museum.

"We were having a lot of students come to the Visiting Artist Lecture Series during the day, but this way, people who are busy during the day have an alternative to come out and experience some of what we have to offer," she said.

wonderful art museum on campus," Dodd said. "The assignment I designed was to have them find a portrait and write imagining yourself to be that person."

She said the assignment she uses at K-State has been adapted to incorporate one of the special exhibits.

"Beach is smaller, so it has less of its permanent collection out," she said. "The Alan Shields exhibition isn't going to include many portraits, so it's important for me to be able to modify my assignments."

The art classes are instructed by Tobias Becker, art class coordinator at Varney's Book Store.

Becker said he likes to teach people how artists use the techniques and how to employ them.

"It's a really good mix to look at how the artists have done it and then play around with these techniques," he said. "They learn they can make museum quality work after we teach them the basics."

The classes are geared to teach people of all ages and skill levels.

"We're really aiming at getting everyone involved," Becker said. "We're all about the vision that art is for everyone."

Schlageck said she is glad to have found a time in the evening when busy students can find time to come to the museum.

"We were having a lot of students come to the Visiting Artist Lecture Series during the day, but this way, people who are busy during the day have an alternative to come out and experience some of what we have to offer," she said.

12 Tournament and go all the way."

The Cats had three front-court players selected to the All-Big 12 women's team. Forward Nicky Ramage was selected to the third team of the all-conference team. Ramage, a junior, led the Cats in scoring this season, averaging 13.8 points per game, and in rebounding averaging 6.5 per game.

The Cats had front-court players Olga Firsova and Finkes named to the team as honorable-mention selections.

K-State also had four players named to Big 12 Academic All-Big 12 team: Morgen Finneran, sophomore in physical therapy; Firsova, junior in international business; Rethman, freshman in marketing; and Kim Woodlee, sophomore in biology and pre-health. Finkes, junior in animal science, was named to the honorable mention team.

The players were part of a K-State team that has defeated four nationally ranked opponents.

Patterson said the KU victory and the wins over nationally ranked opponents demonstrates the team's ability to play at a high level.

"I think it re-establishes the standard of basketball we're capable of playing," Patterson said.

"After a great win like this, emotionally you have to be prepared to compete at the same emotional and physical level the next time out," she said.

WAL-MART

development of the site could be a problem for the Riley County Law Enforcement Center being constructed across Seth Childs.

Although the plans said post-development runoff would be decreased and basins would contain rainwater, Payne said the runoff refers to soil carried away. The water flow itself going towards the law center likely would be increased, he said, once parking lot construction begins.

"If I pour water on the top of this table, you'll get immediate runoff," Payne said.

The added flow could get past basins in heavy rainfall, and the result would be erosion under the law center — a cost for which someone needs to be held accountable, Payne said.

"As a taxpayer, I don't want to keep paying for this facility," he said.

As Reynard officially ended the window for public comment at around 8:30 p.m., counsel for both Wal-Mart and the association spoke.

Knopp, however, brought in specialists to address concerns over store visibility and traffic. Natural Resource Planner Steve Clark said cedar trees could be transplanted from the west to block the supercenter from nearby houses, and Ernie Peters answered questions about his traffic-increase study used in the proposal.

Price Banks, attorney for the neighborhood association, said the supercenter threatens a way of life for residents and is "seriously out of scale" with its surroundings.

Board members themselves seemed to find holes in procedure aggravated by the Wal-Mart proposal.

Member Ray Weisenburger said the situation was largely the result of the city's failure to provide long-term planning.

"I think we always have to remember we're building a community. My concern is we have not identified any strategy for what direction we're going to take this development," he said.

One issue largely debated during the course of the more than four-hour meeting was whether the store should be classified as a regional center or community center.

Since the Comprehensive Land Use Plan dictates only one regional center, already designated as the downtown area, before the city has a population of 75,000, this issue was a sticking point.

"I have trouble fitting this in either of these conditions," member Carol Peak said. "At this point, I don't think we have a real good tool to make this decision."

Other concerns of the board were whether Wal-Mart planned to make its money from local consumers or from out-of-town visitors.

Knopp said no local businesses have said specifically that the Wal-Mart would put them out of business because no one other than chain grocery stores will be in direct competition. The market can support the store or it wouldn't be coming in, he said.

"The economic study you need is an investor coming in to spend their money," Knopp said.

However, member Brad Fenwick said he found no official guarantee from Wal-Mart Director of Community Affairs Keith Morris that the chain would keep the existing store open.

director and have the three divisions actually function as subcommittees, bringing their recommendations to the full board for decisions," Tanner said.

"There will be some money on the table, I think, for the regents as well as the community colleges," he said.

At the request of Senate majority leader Tim Emert, R-Independence, and Sen. Christine Downey, D-Inman, the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee last week introduced a bill that would create a "super" regents board to supervise universities and community colleges.

Emert and Downey favor a 15-member board, divided into three groups, but Tanner said he wouldn't support their plan because it would take a constitutional amendment to change the size of the board.

Tanner said he would rather see a plan that would bring Washburn University of Topeka — a municipal university that gets state aid similar to that which the community colleges receive — into the regents system "as soon as that is fiscally sound and can be worked out."

Under the House plan, the community colleges' boards of trustees would continue to hire and fire personnel.

"We would like to see those boards give up to the regents their responsibility for curriculum development and course management," he said.

The Department of Speech Communication, Theater and Dance will bring Augusto Boal, the founder of Theatre Oppressed, to K-State from Friday to Sunday.

A women's movement timeline will be displayed in the K-State Student Union beginning Sunday. The timeline will trace the women's movement at K-State, nationally and internationally. Some U.S. history will be included to give students some perspective to when events occurred, Allen said.

"Historically, much of the university was organized by structures that supported and benefited men," Spears said. "The Women's Center created a place of support for women where they could voice their opinions. Women's perspectives and voices are more integrated into the the community."

SafeRide, library dominate debate

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

SafeRide and Hale Library funding were the focus of the student body president and vice president candidate debate sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls on Tuesday.

Library funding has been an issue posed at the debate on campus, and one of the questions was how would the candidates put books in the library.

Vice presidential candidate Gabe Eckert said Student Senate unanimously voted to support a $1-per-credit-hour tuition increase, and he and presidential candidate Jason Heinrich were in favor of the increase.

"To maintain student control of that, we would set up a board of students to make sure the money is going where it should," Eckert said.

Presidential and vice presidential candidates Leo Prieto and Chris Bainter said they didn't agree with a tuition increase. Bainter said a tuition increase is like handing someone a blank check, and the students don't have a say where the money goes.

"We are in favor of a privilege fee that would allow students complete control," Bainter said.

Once the library funding increased, the privilege fee could be reviewed and be decreased, he said.

Bainter also said he and Prieto wouldn't concentrate on putting books in the library but rather on better technology and databases that access any book or journal.

Presidential candidate Justin VanNest said the money should come from many different sources, not just a tuition increase and privilege fee.

Bond reduced in burglary shooting

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student arrested last week for the January shooting death of a masked burglar had his bond reduced Tuesday morning.

Richard B. Jones, 711 N. Juliette Ave., Apt. 6, had his bail reduced from $100,000 to $50,000 by the judge at the bond hearing. The bond reduction is dependent upon certain constraints, Assistant Riley County Attorney Brenda Jordan said.

Under the conditions of the reduction, Jones must submit to electronic monitoring at his own expense and may be found only at home, work or classes, Jordan said.

In addition, Jones cannot use any illicit drugs or be found where such drugs would be available, cannot possess a firearm or be found where one would be available and must submit to random drug testing, she said.

Jordan said a preliminary examination has been scheduled for April 8. The state will be expected to provide evidence of a crime and Jones' involvement before the case can proceed to trial. If it does proceed, a formal arraignment will be scheduled, she said.

Jones, senior in business, was arrested Thursday for the Jan. 5 shooting death of Steven Waters, 28, of Junction City. The Riley County Police Department said Jones fired on Waters after he and two others broke into Jones' house. The RCPD said it has received conflicting stories about the break in and has released no motive.

Jones was also charged with possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia.

Honor Council to supervise review of academic dishonesty cases

By ROCHELLE STEELE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On your honor

The Honor System will handle violations of the faculty handbook's academic dishonesty definition. Student reports of academic dishonesty or cases discovered by faculty members can be brought to the Honor Council. The following are some examples of violations.

1. Consultation of textbooks, library materials or notes in examination where such materials are not to be used during the test

2. Use of crib sheets or other hidden notes in an examination, or looking at another student's test paper to copy strategies or answers

3. Having a person other than the one registered in the course stand in at an examination or other graded activity

4. Deliberate falsification of laboratory results, or submission of samples or findings not legitimately derived by the procedures prescribed or allowable

5. Alteration without permission from appropriate authority of examinations, papers, lab reports or other academic exercises

SOURCE: Faculty Handbook

The Honor System, which will begin in fall 1999, overcame two obstacles with the appointment of a director and the acceptance of a constitution.

The system will apply to all undergraduate students, including K-State-Salina students, and the Honor Council will handle violation reports. Phil Anderson, instructor of speech, said the council will adhere to the faculty handbook's definition of academic dishonesty.

The 38-member Honor Council "is the body that adjudicates any instances of academic dishonesty that are reported," Anderson said. The council is composed of two students and two professors from each college except Arts and Sciences, which has three student and three faculty representatives.

Anderson will serve as the first director of the system. His job will include coordinating the implementation of the newly approved constitution.

Provost James Coffman said Anderson was selected because of his reputation and high standards.

"He has a strong rapport with the students and with the faculty and has served long and well in both the Student Senate and the Faculty Senate," Coffman said. "He also has a very strong belief in the importance of this project."

Another important step in the project was approving a constitution, which specifies how the Honor Council will handle investigations, hearings and sanctions.

"That took the bulk of the first semester — to hash out what our bylaws were going to be and our constitution," said Helene Marcoux, graduate student in student counseling/personal services. "That's been a big hurdle. Now we're going to get busy with promoting and making the student body and prospective students aware of the system and what it will entail."

Anderson said there will be two ways cases can be brought to the council.

The first is if a student reports an incident of academic dishonesty. The director first decides if the report has merit. If it does, two case investigators — one student and one faculty representative — will gather information about the incident.

The investigators will present the information to the director who will decide if there is sufficient evidence to continue. If the case continues, the alleged violator is notified of the charge, and the council assigns an adviser to inform the alleged violator of rights and courses of action.

"All of this will be done very discreetly because, at this point, everything is only alleged," Anderson said.

The director then will assign three students and two faculty representatives who have not been involved in the investigation to serve on a hearing panel. A sixth representative will conduct the hearing as chairperson but will not have a vote.

"It is weighted in the students' favor," Anderson said. "There are more students on the hearing panel than there are faculty."

A majority, or three members, of the panel must find the student guilty to impose a sanction.

"A sanction would then be imposed by the Honor Council, and the appropriate dean would be required to carry it out," Anderson said. "That could be either failing the course or others that would be less or more severe."

The second scenario is if a faculty member observes or discovers academic dishonesty. Anderson said the Student fund-raisers break records during '99 Telefund

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 1999 KSU Foundation Telefund finished its final night Monday and continues to set new records, as it has since its creation in 1979.

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving, said $1,126,953 was raised during the 21-day calling period, an 11.5-percent increase from last year.

Dowell said student enthusiasm, alumni dedication, a network of people on campus helping to organize the Telefund and the business community donating prizes are some of the factors that contributed to the success this year.

"We have a core group of students that jumped on the project and made it work," Dowell said. "Most universities have paid positions like telemarketing. This is substantially different, yet remarkably successful."

Dowell said callers averaged about $834 per night, and each evening averaged $53,664. Through the course of the 21 calling sessions, which began Feb. 1, 1,351 callers volunteered. Of the callers, 99 percent were students.

"Once the students got over the shock of calling alumni and asking for money, they had fun and enjoyed what they are doing," Dowell said.

Virginia Moxley, associate dean of academic affairs for the College of Human Ecology, said the college raised $107,500 during Telefund, an increase from last year. She said the average pledge increased, and there had been more $1,000 pledges than in the past, although these made up a small part of the total raised.

Moxley said 40 percent of the money brought in by student volunteers goes toward scholarships. Some is divided among the different departments, and the rest is used to support student activities and physical upgrades to the college.

"The secret is the more students that participate, the more callers there are and the more pledges come in," Moxley said. "The enthusiasm of the students is wonderful, and the alumni respond to that."

Dowell said eight of the nine colleges at K-State set new records. The College of Engineering set the highest

Man attacked by girlfriend, hospitalized after incident

DODGE CITY, Kan. — Police declined to arrest a woman who reportedly tried to sever her boyfriend's penis with a boning knife.

The boyfriend remained hospitalized on Tuesday at Western Plains Regional Hospital. The incident happened early Monday morning.

Lt. John Ball said Tuesday that doctors operated on the man to reattach his penis. At his request, a hospital spokeswoman declined to release any information on his condition.

"Apparently the male told the female he had been unfaithful and after he was asleep, she cut his penis with the knife," police chief Ed Jaakola said Monday.

Ball said the case will be forwarded to the Ford County attorney's office.

State revenue shortfall could affect highway plan

TOPEKA — A nearly $32 million revenue shortfall in February sent budgetary shivers through the Legislature on Tuesday, with the Graves administration cautioning lawmakers they'd better stick tightly to the governor's proposed budget.

Legislative leaders said the revenue decline should boost support for paying for part of a new transportation plan by issuing long-term bonds. They also saw it as diminishing hopes for more than token tax cuts this session.

"This is pretty serious," said Duane Goossen, Gov. Bill Graves' budget director. "This should be a wake-up call for everyone involved. This is more than some end-of-the-month glitch. We are clearly off the estimate now."

That suggests the Legislature should look very carefully at its spending habits the rest of the session. Spending beyond the governor's budget simply is not going to be feasibly possible if we don't recover from this trend," Goossen said.

Legislative leaders said the new revenue figures are likely to influence the debate about a new transportation program.

The House approved a plan that would require $2.1 billion in new revenues over eight years on the assumption that tax collections would grow enough with the economy.

Contamination blamed for miscarriages, 14 deaths

CHICAGO — The death toll linked to contaminated hot dogs and deli meats made by Sara Lee Corp.'s Bil Mar Foods in Michigan has reached 14, government health investigators said.

In addition, the tainted meat has been blamed for six miscarriages and 97 illnesses in 22 states from early August to Jan. 17, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported Monday.

The outbreak is the nation's second-deadliest involving listeria bacteria.

On Dec. 22, Bil Mar began a recall of 15 million pounds of hot dogs and cold cuts produced at its Zeeland, Mich., plant after a strain of listeria was found in opened and unopened packages.

Listeria can be found in soil, water and various raw foods. The bacteria can cause death or severe illness in women who are pregnant, people with weakened immune systems, newborns and the elderly.

Baseball notables selected for Hall of Fame induction

TAMPA, Fla. — Orlando Cepeda, the Baby Bull who earned his reputation with a big bat, and three others were elected to the Baseball Hall of Fame on Tuesday by the Veterans Committee.

Former umpire Nestor Chylak, turn-of-the-century manager Frank Selee and Negro Leagues pitcher Smokey Joe Williams also were selected.

The 12-member Veterans panel, which included former Cepeda teammate Juan Marichal, Ted Williams and Stan Musial, passed over Bill Mazeroski, Dom DiMaggio, former manager Dick Williams and umpire Doug Harvey.

"As a rookie on the Veterans Committee, I'm glad he got in on my first year," Marichal said of Cepeda.

"He was the type of player who had no fear, the type of player you wanted playing behind you," he said.

Induction ceremonies will be July 25 at Cooperstown, N.Y. Nolan Ryan, George Brett and Robin Yount were elected in January by the Baseball Writers' Association of America.

The Veterans could elect one person from each of four categories: former major leaguers, Negro Leaguers, 19th-century players and personnel, plus a composite of managers, umpires, executives and Negro leaguers.

Legislation would require credit-card information

WASHINGTON, D.C. — You've seen the enticingly low "teaser" rates on envelopes offering new credit card accounts. How long do the rates last, and what higher rates will replace them?

Legislation proposed Tuesday by Democratic lawmakers would require credit-card companies to spell out that information more clearly.

The companies also would have to disclose clearly any conditions under which the introductory "teaser" rate might be revoked, such as failure to make timely monthly payments.

It would also place restrictions on establishing new credit card accounts for people under age 21 and would ban card issuers from canceling accounts or imposing new fees on customers who pay off monthly balances in full.

Credit-card companies "are taking advantage of current law to hook new customers with misleading promotions and to encourage customers to carry increasing debt burdens," said Rep. John LaFalce of New York, the House Banking Committee's senior Democrat. He is the bill's chief sponsor.

With personal bankruptcies continuing to soar, lawmakers of both parties last week began pushing legislation backed by credit-card companies that would make it harder for people to erase their debts in bankruptcy court.

LaFalce's bill eventually could be attached to the bankruptcy overhaul legislation, as happened last year, when the House passed such legislation. The Senate adjourned without voting on it.

Buchanan announces third campaign for presidency

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Pat Buchanan, the pugnacious conservative whose insurgent campaigns hobbled Republican front-runners in 1992 and 1996, launched a third White House bid Tuesday with a pledge to fight "a moral deficit that has become America's great enemy within."

Suggesting that the Clinton administration has contributed to "a polluted and poisoned" culture, Buchanan delivered a full-throated attack on the Democratic White House.

"This temple of our civilization has been desecrated, used to shake down corporate executives, to lie with abandon to the American people, a place to exploit women," he said.

He promised to stand against unfettered imports, freewheeling immigration, abortion, euthanasia, a shrinking American sovereignty and, at times, his own party — all familiar themes of a Buchanan candidacy.

Though he has a history of exceeding their predictions, many GOP strategists and conservative activists believe Buchanan's third race won't be charmed.

Working against him this time: a swelling field of like-minded candidates, a greater demand for money and a relatively late start.

Students report 11 election violations

Election chair says he's frustrated by problems so early in the campaign.

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After only three days of student body election campaigning, Election Committee Chair Joe Ashley said Tuesday that campaign violations already are piling up.

Ashley said he wrote up five violations Monday and six violations Tuesday. He said this was a high number so early in the campaign.

"That's kind of worrying me, because my committee's going to get bogged down with this instead of concentrating on actual polling like we should be," he said.

One of the violations was chalk on things other than the sidewalk, Ashley said. There was chalk on the planters outside of Durland Hall, which is a violation because it's not an area pedestrians are supposed to use.

Another violation was chalking under overhangs of buildings. Chalking have to be 10 feet away from any entrance, including the overhangs.

A serious violation Ashley wrote up Tuesday was chalking in residence hall zones, he said.

"There was a guy that was so bold that he chalked by Derby Dining Center in the residence hall area," he said.

In compliance with Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, there are two regions, the west and east, that are off-limits to campaigning, which includes advertisements, documents or any device that promotes or opposes the election of a candidate.

The west region is all-university property enclosed by Claflin Road, Denison Avenue, Platt Street and Sunset Avenue. The east region is all-university property enclosed by Claflin Road, Manhattan Avenue, Campus Creek Road, Petticoat Lane and Mid-Campus Drive.

"Anything in that area is not good," Ashley said.

Paul English, election hearing board chair, said residence hall guidelines aren't passed down by the 60 members on Student Senate but by the 3,200 members of the residence halls who want their residences to be free of campaigning.

City and county governmental candidates aren't allowed to campaign in these areas either.

Ashley said candidates should know these regulations because they had mandatory meetings in which they discussed the campaign regulations.

"It's kind of frustrating," Ashley said.

Violations will go before the Election Hearing Board, and it will decide if there was a violation. If there is a violation, it will decide a reasonable penalty.

A possible penalty for a big offense such as tampering with ballots or other election equipment is disqualification. A smaller offense such as failing to comply with campaign activities regulations could result in a $10 fine.

English said it's important that candidates follow the rules.

"If someone who's running for an office isn't able to follow the guidelines that are laid before them, then will this affect their ability as a future leader?" he said.

In past elections there haven't been as many violations, but English said he's seen six years of election campaigns, and this one isn't more extravagant than the ones before.

So it probably isn't that there are more violations this year, but that the rules are just being enforced more strictly, he said.

"We're trying to apply attention to as much detail as possible," English said. "If we apply a professional approach to running an election, then the product will be the most qualified candidate. That's the lesson of citizenship that we can all take stock in our leaders and government."

English said students also can write up violations if they see one. There are complaint forms in the Office of Student Activities and Services, located on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

"If people see something and want to report it, they have access to forms," English said.

MARCH 8-10

Chris McCarthy, junior in physical anthropology, and Chris Masters, senior in management information systems, are running for student body president and vice president at K-State. Masters is running for president and McCarthy is his running mate.

Candidates would reform fees, parking

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chris Masters and Chris McCarthy, two childhood friends, are looking to make a difference in the lives of K-State students.

Masters, senior in management information systems, and McCarthy, junior in physical anthropology, are running for student body president and vice president.

"I've been a student here now for four years, and there are a lot of things I would like to see changed," Masters said.

Masters said he would like to see reforms made in the privilege-fee distribution and see the individual student have more control about where their privilege-fee money goes.

"A lot of people are paying for a lot of Services they don't necessarily use," Masters said.

Masters cited privileges like recreational Services and Lafene Health Center as areas that some people use and others do not. He said he would like to see students pay for what they use and not have to pay for services they do not use.

McCarthy and Masters said running for office is not something they are doing because of the prominence of the position.

"We're not just doing this to put a line on a résumé," Masters said. "We'd like to make a difference."

Masters said one of the things he would address if elected would be the situation of parking on campus.

"We've looked at parking at other Big 12 colleges and what they do, and we see that parking on campus is ridiculous," McCarthy said. "There has to be a solution."

The two said they have ideas for a solution, but they would like to examine the different solutions more in-depth once elected to office. Solutions, they said, could include a parking garage.

The pair said they would like to see a SafeRide program if it could be done on a volunteer basis.

"I think it would be an excellent idea, if it was a volunteer program like Wildcat Walk," McCarthy said.

McCarthy has been an escort-service member for two years, and he said a SafeRide program could be initiated in the same manner.

Another subject on their agenda is the amount of journals and usable information available in the library.

"I haven't hardly used the library at all really," McCarthy said.

"Because I just don't find anything," he said.

They said they would like to see more funding from alumni for the library.

"The best way would be for alumni sources to help do it," Masters said.

The subject of KSDB-FM 91.9's recent audit is also a subject that convinced Masters and McCarthy to run. McCarthy said he was shocked to learn about the way the radio station mismanaged funds, and in the future, the station needs to be run differently.

"I think if they can't break even or make a profit, then they need to find a different way to do it," Masters said.

Masters and McCarthy also said they want to reach out to younger K-State students whom they say aren't always heard.

"When I was a freshman, no one spoke to me," McCarthy said. "We want to give them a sense of belonging, and they don't need to stay in their dorm room but get involved in the university."

Masters and McCarthy said they have as good of an opportunity of winning as anyone else, and that they want to encourage the student body to vote.

"I want people to vote for what they believe in and not have an election won by who can round up the most buddies," Masters said.

Running for office has been fun for the two childhood friends, and they said they are enjoying their attempt to make a difference.

"It's been a good time. We'd really like to do something to help out the university," Masters said. "We want to see these things done as much as anyone else."

The running mates will appear on the ballot as Buzz Masters and Big McCarthy.

SafeRide shouldn't be funded by students

Student Senate should not fall into the trap of, "Where KU goes, K-State must follow." Unfortunately, that seems to be the mentality when it comes to the development of a SafeRide system. The program would create a new mode of transportation for students to get free rides home. It primarily would be used for students under the influence of alcohol, so that they would not need to drive drunk.

The University of Kansas has a similar program, as do Iowa State University, the University of Texas and other Big 12 schools. But what works for other schools does not always work for K-State.

Remember, K-State has its main party district, Aggieville, one block from campus. Most other schools have bars concentrated evenly throughout the city or away from campus.

Senators in favor of the proposal will say that SafeRide could be used to transport students who are, for example, studying late at the library and are either unable or unwilling to walk home at night. But, honestly, no one is going to want a ride home in the drunkmobile.

More importantly, no one should want to pay for a drunkmobile. It's a sad day when senators aren't willing to pass a privilege fee to fund the library, but seriously are considering a privilege fee to cart drunks home from Aggieville.

Keeping drunk drivers off the road is indeed a serious concern. SafeRide just isn't a realistic solution. The report that the SafeRide committee will present to Senate points out that Riley County Police Department reported 561 DUIs during 1998. But remember that SafeRide would operate only for students, and therefore many of those DUIs would not be counteracted by the program.

Think about the program philosophically. The students who are responsible enough to use a system such as SafeRide are the ones who are not driving drunk now. There is no reason to make all students pay for a designated driver when those who would use it already have one.

Students should not let the committee's findings determine the wishes of the entire campus. Tell student senators that this is a bad idea.

Tell them now, while they're listening. After all, elections are only a week away.

BLACK MARK on the RECORD

Check bouncing leaves more than just a large bill

Last Wednesday was a beautiful day, wasn't it? Yep, definitely a day for the record books. I know I'll always remember it. That was the day the Riley County Police Department found out who I was.

I am not traditionally in the habit of letting The Man know where I live. Actually, I prefer to remain pretty much anonymous to the police. My dad was a state trooper, and I figure that's about as close to the law as I need to be.

But Wednesday, when I came bopping up my street in the sunshine with my headphones blaring and the wind to my back, what did I discover but a little orange card fluttering in my doorjamb.

"We have four papers for you," it said. My name was spelled correctly, and the address of the police station was written clearly in English, so I had no excuse.

Even before I knew what it was about I felt my bank account getting a lot lighter. Call it misplaced maternal instinct.

Generally, when the police decide to pay a call there will be a fine to be paid or a friendly visit to a judge. Usually both.

Here's the thing. I knew exactly what this was about: I went through some bad financial karma last summer when I was bouncing checks to keep body and soul together. Being the independent type, I didn't borrow any money from my parents, even though they would have floated me a loan, had I asked.

Instead, I dug my own financial hole. I thought I had taken care of everything, but this one apparently got under the radar.

So now I owe Dillons and Riley County $240.15, or $276.01 after March 17 for a check that was originally $35.

I'll confess; I knew the check was bad when I wrote it. But I figured if I'm going to bounce a check, I might as well bounce a big one. Twisted logic, but I got an extra box of cereal and some Hohos.

I have the money to pay this off, so save yourself a telephone. What burns me is that it took this long for them to find me. I mean, August for Pete's sake. And I haven't moved since then, either.

When I went down to the police station to collect my little summons, the gentleman behind the counter actually seemed surprised to see me and thanked me for coming in. Apparently they don't get many people trading in their little orange cards.

So now here I am, three weeks before my court date. I want to be mad and indignant and all that good stuff, but I can't. I got caught, plain and simple. I have a black mark on my permanent record. I did the crime and now I have to pay the fine, because going to jail for bad checks is just dumb.

I don't plan to ignore it either. The summons won't go away, and a friend of mine is paying off a fine of more than $700 for a check that was originally $25. I can learn by example.

Yep, last Wednesday sure was a beautiful day.

VIEWPOINT

GUYTON

Masters, McCarthy favor student choices

We made the decision to run for the office of student body president and vice president for one reason: Every year we have attended K-State, we have listened to friends and other students complain about issues that never seem to be dealt with.

Without a doubt, one of the largest problems is the issue of parking.

Through good representation of the student body, and working with faculty, we hope to come up with a plausible solution that will be feasible for all. This may be impossible, but we will work to the best of our ability to find the optimal solution.

Another concern we have is the amount of usable information in Hale Library.

It is a shame to have such a beautiful building going to waste because students cannot get or find what they need. Many of us have run the gauntlet only to find the journal we require is not carried by the library because of a lack of funds.

Furthermore, every student at K-State pays privilege fees. In the case of most students, they have no idea where their money is going. Nevertheless, the fact remains that students pay for either organizations, activities or both they will never use.

We will propose a plan to allow students a choice of determining where their money is spent. This will give students the ability to utilize every dollar they pay — not wasting it on things they'll never use.

Books. We would like to investigate why students are forced to pay so much for textbooks and then sell them back for pennies on the dollar, only to find out they will be put right back on the shelf to be sold for another large profit.

We are all paying dearly for our Union only to turn around and be ripped off. We would like to see the 'Student' Union given back to the students by starting a program that supports students who continue to support the Union — this plan would give the students a much lower rate on supplies and used textbooks.

To sum it up, Masters and McCarthy are about the students.

We see these issues as the most prevalent problems that should be addressed promptly. We do not claim to be anything we're not. By no means are we the best students at K-State — just average hard-working people who want to make a difference.

VanNest, Olson promote education of students about privilege-fee uses

Charles Warner said, "Politics makes strange bedfellows." You know, he's right. Six months ago, we never expected to be here, but here we are, ready to lead K-State into the next millennium.

We have some very strong opinions on the issues we have selected as our platform. We feel these issues are vital to the success of K-State as a whole.

The first issue we have is that of library funding. K-State students several years ago voted to improve the quality of the library. The original building was in a terrible state of disrepair. Now we have a spectacular building that is one of the finest on campus.

Until you look at the contents. The library has cut many of its journal subscriptions, and books are not being ordered. It is $4 million behind in funding and the lowest ranked library in the Big 12. Pathetic, considering how well K-State has done in other areas. Why can't we have a great library as well as a top-ranked football team?

The problem is now the privilege fee committee feels that it isn't their job to find funds. They think it's someone else's job. Yes, to an extent it is. The library is the result of multiple sources, and that is how the contents should be funded as well. We need a better library, now.

Our next issue is that of faculty salaries. The faculty here is paid on average 12 percent behind the average. The typical student wonders, "Why should I care?" Easy, your instructors' pay reflects the quality of your education. A lower paid instructor may not be as good as available. Top professors are not going to stay nor will they come here when instructors are needed.

By hiring lower-quality instructors and cutting cost, you don't receive the quality of education you deserve. What does this mean? Lower salary. You make less money because you don't have a good education.

How do we fix this? We, as a student body, need to let the legislature know that we want our faculty paid what they are worth, not this sub-standard income they are getting. Hopefully the bigwigs in Topeka will listen to 20,000-plus voters.

The third item is privilege fees. Students have no idea how their privilege fees are spent. We want to educate people as to what they are being spent on and make sure that fees are spent on what students want. We will review every fee to make sure it is being used wisely and is necessary for organizations to function.

Lastly, we want anyone who wants to run for Student Government to be able to do so. We think that there are many qualified students out there, but choose not to run because of cost. We want to make sure that anyone can run.

We want people to know that if we are elected, we will do what we can to address any concern you have. We will be available for you. That is our slogan, "Working for you. Working for K-State."

We are nearing the end of a journey that started in August. We are about to come full circle, two very unlikely candidates, approaching the end of the election process. Now all that is left is for you to sort out the issues and decide which ones are real and which ones are fluff and pick the right people to lead K-State into the 21st century.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

This is for people who have trouble finding places and get upset with people who take their places. Failure to plan ahead on your part does not constitute an emergency on my part.

Kudos to Ken Wells for identifying the importance of secretaries on campus. Now let's see if he can convince the higher-ups of that same importance.

I was just commenting on all of the greeks vs. non greeks. Is K-State really that uneventful that all there is to report on is stuff that it seems is really trivial and has nothing to do with higher education? Come on, let's report on something that is worth reading about.

I want to thank the 60 members of Student Senate who finally did something positive for those idiots who always scale West Stadium? You know, I'm sure there are other things happening around campus that you could take pictures of, OK?

Hey, Collegian. Could you guys put some other pictures on the front page except for those idiots who always scale West Stadium? You know, I'm sure there are other things happening around campus that you could take pictures of, OK?

Does the Student Senate even know how much it's going to take to get the legislature to pass a tuition increase? It's going to take a lot of time and a lot of money — neither of which we really have.

I would like to know why the Landon Lecture Series speakers are always just white, Republican men.

I still can't believe that our Student Senate is willing to put between $1 to $5 per credit hour into getting drunks home from Aggieville but won't put a dollar in per credit hour that will get students into the library.

Could someone please tell me what the difference between a tuition increase and a privilege fee increase would be? I'm still going to have to pay that money, aren't I?

Survey design flaws contribute to interpretation problems

Editor,

The discussion concerning the results found by the students of the Human Needs class has brought up some interesting points that as a statistician I can help to clarify.

First, the way that any study is designed can greatly affect the results. It does not matter how many people conduct the research; it does not matter how many people are contacted. The two most important issues to consider when designing any survey are bias and precision.

Bias occurs in many ways, but there are two main sources: the way the sample is selected and the way the questions are worded. In terms of sample selection, if a random sample is not used (and by random I mean completely random, where everyone in the population has an equal chance of being selected), bias will most certainly occur. For example, I heard that one of our GTAs was approached by an undergraduate two Saturdays ago in the library on a Saturday afternoon while studying for upcoming exams. The GTA was asked to fill out a survey talking about attitudes toward K-State. This is a biased sample.

As for wording of the questions, even small changes in wording can reflect a change in the results. Extensive research in the area of survey sampling and design has been done on this. An example from recent history includes the wording of questions regarding how the public feels about Bill Clinton. Adding one phrase ("AS A PERSON") changed the results by 20 percent.

Statistical reliability refers to the repeatability of results. Timing of the survey, selection of the sample, training of the interviewer, wording of the questions and the size of the sample, all play a role in the reliability of a survey. If care is not taken to acknowledge these issues in the design, then we cannot make any reasonable conclusions about the results, no matter how many surveys are done and no matter how many people are asked.

Precision refers to the consistency of the results. This depends and is measured based on the size of the sample. Gallup uses about 1,500 people in its surveys to have a margin of error of around 2.5 percent. This is not a magic number. However, the smaller the sample, the greater the margin of error.

It should also be noted that precision of survey results doesn't mean the results are necessarily credible. Precision just means the results are repeatable. If there is bias present, the results will just be repeatedly wrong! Take a placekicker on a football team who consistently misses the uprights by 1 foot to the right. What good is it that he is consistent?

It is very important that we not fall into the trap of saying even though a study is not scientific or statistically reliable, that we can still take something away from it. We cannot. I teach this in my Stat 100 course. You can't skip past these issues. Problems in design lead to problems with the conclusions. If that were not the case, then statistics as a discipline would not even exist, nor would the strong emphasis placed on the scientific method when making decisions of any importance, from determining the efficacy of a new drug to learning the effects of day care on young children. Should the opinions of students at K-State be studied with any less rigor? I think not, given the financial implications at the very least.

My last comment is we have an Institutional Review Board on campus who must approve any surveys or studies that involve contact with anyone outside of those students within a particular class. I am not certain these studies were submitted to the IRB for approval, but I want to take the opportunity to say that anyone conducting surveys in this way need to go through this process.

Cats win opening game

Women's basketball team holds out to beat Colorado in beginning round of Big 12 tournament; inexperience affects ability to dominate

STORIES BY NICK BRATKOVIC ■ PHOTO BY IVAN KOZAR

The eighth-seeded K-State women's basketball team managed to hang on for a win Tuesday in the opening round of the Big 12 Tournament against No. 9-seed Colorado. The Wildcat squad beat the Buffaloes 55-51 at Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo.

The Cats clinched the back-and-forth game when Olga Firsova hit the second of two free throws with 20 seconds remaining, giving the Cats a four-point lead and securing the game. The free throw capped a spell in which Firsova was the Cats' only main front-court players in the game.

Forward Brandy Harris was moved to the four spot, grabbing 16 rebounds in the game. The move was a result of foul trouble for K-State. Earlier in the game forward Nicky Ramage and Angie Finkes fouled out, forcing the Cats to go to a smaller lineup.

Firsova said playing without Finkes and Ramage was a difficult adjustment. "Well, I was kind of scared, and for a second I panicked, but then I knew I better step up mentally and physically," Firsova said.

Ramage said it was difficult not being on the court in the game's final minutes. "It was very frustrating," Ramage said. "There is not anything to do sitting on the bench."

K-State head coach Deb Patterson said the Cats played the second half in a bit of a stalling mode after starting it off with a 17-point lead.

"I felt it was a situation where we held them off," Patterson said. "Probably about the 1:37 mark I felt a little bit better about our ability to make stops on the defensive end, but probably the first 18 minutes of that game, it was mostly good things for Colorado."

In the second half the Buffaloes managed to make two significant runs: a 10-point run early in the half and then a 14-2 run starting with 10:34 left in the game.

Patterson said her team couldn't find a rhythm in the second half.

"We just never established a go-to rhythm or presence the first eight minutes of that second half," Patterson said.

Patterson said she felt like her team's youth and lack of depth affected their ability to dominate the entire game.

"We don't have a lot of depth. The concept of us beating a team by 18 or 20 points is unrealistic for us," Patterson said. In the first half, the Cats used a 14-0 run to build up a 12-point lead. Throughout the half Ramage dominated for the Cats, scoring the team's first 13 points.

"I was pumped up for the game, I guess," Ramage said. "We know we can go out there and handle whatever they throw at us."

Ramage was the only K-State player to score until guard Kim Woodlee hit a three-pointer, giving the Cats a 16-13 lead. The shot sparked a 14-0 Cats run.

The first half was marked by turnovers as the Cats committed eight, but they held Colorado to 26-percent shooting. Colorado committed 10 first-half turnovers. At half-time the Cats were shooting 46 percent from the field with a 34-17 lead.

Patterson said the two teams seemed to switch roles in the first and second halves.

"They struggled the first half, and we struggled in the second," Patterson said. "If we played another 20 minutes I am not sure who would be in the lead."

Firsova said she was disappointed the team allowed Colorado back into the game in the second half.

"We started making mistakes," Firsova said. "We put them on the line a lot more than we should."

K-State junior forward Nicky Ramage battles into position with Colorado forward Shelley Garcia Tuesday afternoon during the women's Big 12 Tournament at Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo. The Cats defeated the Buffaloes 55-51 and will face Texas Tech at noon today.

Cats look ahead to game against top-seeded Red Raiders

The K-State women's basketball team is still alive in the Big 12 Conference Tournament as it keeps its hopes up for an NCAA tournament bid.

After a tough opening-round win over Colorado, the Cats take on top-seeded Texas Tech in the second round of the Big 12 tournament at noon today at Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo.

K-State head coach Deb Patterson said the team is looking forward to competing against Texas Tech.

"We're excited about the opportunity to play tomorrow, and we know we've got a great challenge ahead of us in Texas Tech," she said.

Texas Tech, ranked No. 9 in the nation, enters the game after receiving a first-round bye. The Red Raiders are coming off a season in which they went 25-3 and 14-2 in the Big 12 Conference.

The Red Raiders are led in scoring by senior Angie Brazier. Brazier, the Big 12 Player of the Year, averages 21 points per game.

In the Cats' first meeting this season with Texas Tech, Brazier shot just 7-23 to score just 16 points. In the Jan. 9 loss, Texas Tech defeated K-State 73-60.

K-State coaches and players said the game will be a difficult test.

"WHETHER YOU'RE COLORADO AND YOU'RE YOUNG, OR YOU'RE KANSAS STATE AND YOU'RE YOUNG, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHALLENGES IS TO REMAIN FOCUSED ON EVERY POSITION."

—DEB PATTERSON
K-STATE HEAD COACH

"Texas Tech is a tremendous ball club with multiple dimensions," Patterson said.

Patterson said the Texas Tech game will be a challenge for her young team to focus on every position against the Red Raiders.

"Whether you're Colorado and you're young, or you're Kansas State and you're young, one of the greatest challenges is to remain focused on every position," Patterson said.

After surrendering 32 turnovers in the first meeting, Patterson said her team needs to do a better job of ball handling. "I think we need to take better care of the ball," she said. "Better than the first time we played, but that is obviously a great challenge anytime you have a guard like Katrina O'Neal."

In the first meeting against Texas Tech, K-State was led in scoring by freshman Kristin Rethman, who scored 15 points in the loss. Rethman, against the Red Raiders, was 5-7 from three-point range.

With the Cats playing on just a day's rest and looking to bounce back from a physical game against Colorado, junior center Olga Firsova said the team is ready for round two.

"We're ready, and were excited, I think we're going to do our best and play hard," Firsova said.

Victory over Aggies might be last opportunity for NCAA Tournament bid

■ Six senior members of men's team attempt return to tourney for first time since 1993.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

With the season winding down and only the Big 12 Conference Tournament left to play, this will be last chance for the seniors on K-State men's basketball team to reach the NCAA National Tournament as they prepare to play Texas A & M in the first round of the tournament.

The six seniors will embark on the conference tournament, where the Cats haven't advanced past the second round since the 1993 season when K-State was eventually defeated by the Missouri Tigers in the third round.

Defeating the Aggies on Thursday would be the first step to returning to the NCAA Tournament for the first time since the 1995 season. Manny Dies, Shawn Rhodes and Ayome May made their first and only appearance in the "Big Dance" as freshmen against New Mexico in the first round of the tourney.

K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said the seniors would like to have the first meeting between the Aggies back but now are focusing on making an effect in the tournament.

"It probably is a game that they would like back," Fox said of the Feb. 10, 79-74 loss at Texas A&M. "They know now that it is important for them to go to Kansas City and try to do some damage in the tournament."

Fox said when the game is on the line, the most experienced players want to step up.

"At crunch time, our most experienced players want to do well," he said. "They have high expectations for the team."

According to the K-State ticket office, the conference tournament ticket sales are down this year for both the Big 12 Conference as a whole, including K-State. Sales for K-State tickets are 150 below last season's mark. Tickets are still available through the ticket office for $180 for an all-sessions ticket.

K-State senior notes:

■ May and senior guard Chris Griffin were selected to the 1999 All Big 12 Honorable-Mention team, while juniors Cortez Groves and Tony Kitt were named to the conference All-Newcomer team.

■ K-State players also excelled in the classroom as Rhodes, senior in business administration, and Josh Reid, junior in business administration, were named to the 1999 Men's Basketball Academic All-Big 12 team. Kitt and freshman Travis Reynolds were given Honorable Mention status.

■ May and Rhodes are battling at the end of the season to both finish in the top-20 scorers list at K-State. May stands at 941 career points, while Rhodes has scored 938 points. For both to finish in the top 20, they would have to pass Eddie Elder, who posted 989 points from 1981 to 85.

■ Rhodes has been busy changing the record books this season. In addition to his ranking of 21 in all-time K-State scoring, Rhodes has taken over the top spot in career blocked shots at K-State with 117. He is also tied for 12th with 576 career rebounds and sits at 13th in steals with 64.

■ Dies is pressuring Rhodes for the top spot in blocks. For now, Rhodes is by himself at the top with 117, but Dies is right behind him with 116 career blocks. Dies has also saved his better performances for the end of the season. Through his first 18 games, Dies scored in double figures just six times. In his past 10 games, he has scored in double figures eight times, with his last double-digit effort coming against Nebraska on Feb. 24 when he tied his season high with 19 points.

■ This senior class has been to postseason play two times and faces a possible chance to return this season. The Cats played in the NCAA National Tournament in 1995 and in the Nations Invitational Tournament last season. The class is attempting to be the 17th senior class in school history to make three post-season tournament appearances.

■ They have posted a 62-52 career record at K-State in their four years here.

Track-and-field coaching staff molds athletes into Olympic competitors despite neglect of facilities

VIEWPOINT

WHITE

Someday, K-State will realize it has the best track and field coaching staff in the nation.

In only five and a half seasons as K-State's head coach, Cliff Rovelto has coached two Olympians, a U.S. national champion and three NCAA champions. Assistant Coach Steve Fritz's credentials, a fourth-place finish in the 1996 Olympic decathlon and a 1997 National Decathlon Championship, speak for themselves. Assistant Coach Randy Cole earned the 1998 Big 12 Women's Cross Country Coach of the Year award in only his second season in the Big 12. The staff also includes Mike Smith, Kelly McMillin and Troy Engle.

The staff has guided the program to several impressive accomplishments. The men's team finished 10th in the 1998 NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships.

The women's cross country team won the 1998 Big 12 Championship and finished 13th at the NCAA Championships.

Currently, the women's team sits in second place, behind Florida, in the United States Track Coaches Association Power Rating. The power rating measures a team's total strength in a dual meet. K-State's women, going head to head against any other team in the nation, except Florida, would be favored to win.

Junior multi-event athlete Atila Zsivoczky, who holds the highest heptathlon score in the country this season at 5,702 points, came to K-State because of the coaching staff. Having an Olympic decathlete as a coach has to be a plus.

Senior weight thrower Renetta Seiler, who has the best throw in the NCAA this season, came to K-State because relatively few schools recruited her out of high school. The K-State coaching staff saw her potential.

Although K-State may land these extraordinary athletes and have extraordinary teams on occasion even without the best facilities, Rovelto conceded that the track program will rarely be able to have athletes of that caliber in its current facility situation.

"Being as objective as I can possibly be, if we're ranked in the top five in the national power ratings and we're in the top third of the Big 12 Conference, which is without question the best track and field conference in the country top to bottom across the board of events, and then if we can go to the national meet and be among the top 15 — if we're doing that kind of thing pretty much on a year-in, year-out basis, I mean quite frankly, I don't know if Kansas State can do any better than that with the resources and whatnot that we have," Rovelto said. "I mean that's pretty much maxed out."

When an outstanding program maxes out with the existing facilities, the obvious solution would be for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to pump money into the program.

As it is right now, K-State falls farther and farther behind.

Texas recently built a $26 million soccer/track and field complex — making it the best outdoor track facility in the nation.

Nebraska is in the process of spending $3.75 million on an indoor facility, which would make it the best indoor facility in the nation.

Missouri has a new outdoor facility and recently renovated its indoor facility. Kansas is building a new outdoor facility and renovating its indoor.

Emporia State, which will be host to the Emporia Relays April 1, has a better outdoor facility than K-State.

K-State's outdoor facility isn't good enough to be host to a real track meet. That's like putting Rovelto and his staff in a straitjacket. They have the tools to turn K-State into one of the best track and field programs in the country. They just don't have the facilities to recruit more of the athletes that can make it happen.

The way it stands, the track and field program will keep representing K-State by churning out Olympians, national champions and NCAA champions, yet it will continue to be neglected.

"We're going to try to continue to improve, but we're kind of an insane group here," Rovelto said. "We don't accept that maybe there are limitations."

Candidates also were asked whether they were in favor of SafeRide and, if they were, if they supported a privilege fee.

Presidential candidate Willis Kidd said he thought there should be a SafeRide referendum that students would vote on. He said there should be two questions on it: Do you support it, and will you utilize it if it's implemented?

Kidd said the program should be funded partly by the students who use it. "I think they should pay a fee for the trip," he said.

A privilege fee should be used only to maintain it, Kidd said.

Bainter said a plebiscite vote was taken three years ago and more than 60 percent of the students were in favor of a SafeRide program and would utilize it.

"As far as funding, research shows that it would cost 25 cents per person per semester to fund this," he said. "That's less than a telephone call to someone to come pick you up."

Presidential candidate Rick Wooten said some people are opposed because they believe it's only for the drunks. But he asked the audience members if they would rather have the drunks driving themselves or riding in a car with someone else.

Every person drinking and driving could result in a fatality, Wooten said. "There's certainly more reasons to do it than not to do it," he said.

Candidates were asked what their legacy would be if they were to become student body president and vice president.

"We took an interest in the individual, and we were there for the students,"

Heinrich said.

VanNest's legacy went back to his platform issue of increasing library funding.

"Hopefully, my main legacy will be that we will have a library that we can be proud of," he said.

Wooten combined many K-State issues into one statement of what he and his running mate Aaron Shea's legacy would be.

"Our legacy would be things have gone up," he said.

This included enrollment, parking, library funding and everyone's smiles. Presidential candidate Aaron Velasquez summed his legacy up in two words — contented students.

"As long as they're happy, that would be a great legacy," he said.

Chris Masters, presidential candidate, and Chris McCarthy, vice presidential candidate, did not attend.

choosing no opinion.

One statement on the survey said, "I would probably utilize a SafeRide program at K-State." Forty-one percent of the students surveyed agreed. A majority either disagreed or didn't have an opinion.

However, 89 percent of the students agreed with a statement that said, "I believe a SafeRide program would make our community safer."

Guthrie said the scariest part of the survey was that a majority of the students surveyed said they had driven an automobile after consuming alcohol.

Even though the statement didn't specify how much alcohol had been consumed or how long after consuming it the student drove, the statistic still was scary, she said.

"It was really disturbing, the number of people who said yes," Guthrie said.

The survey also addressed the issue of how many nights per week SafeRide should operate if implemented.

According to the survey, most students thought SafeRide should operate on Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays. But one student surveyed said it should run every night of the week because there are drink specials every night of the week.

"This makes sense," Mathes said. "Safety should be a concern seven days of the week."

Funding SafeRide was another factor to be considered. A majority of the students said they would be willing to pay a privilege fee for the service.

Guthrie said the cost of a SafeRide program at K-State would be similar to costs at the University of Kansas.

KU has a budget of $95,000 for its program.

The greatest cost would be the initial start-up cost and advertising, Mathes said.

"Once it got started the costs would probably decline," she said.

But, Guthrie said, just because some students are willing to pay a privilege fee doesn't mean one will be initiated.

The committee has looked for other ways to fund a SafeRide program. Mathes said one thing they have looked into is sponsors, but they haven't come up with anything definite.

KU's SafeRide program, which has been running since 1989, is funded by students.

Nicole Skalla, KU transportation coordinator, said students pay $14 a semester for transportation, but less than $2 actually goes to SafeRide.

KU's SafeRide runs every night of the week from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. It doesn't run on holidays, when classes aren't in session, or during the summer.

"In a typical week it picks up an average of 5.7 passengers per vehicle per hour," Skalla said.

Skalla said it's hard to tell whether SafeRide actually has decreased DUIs. She said the police say it has made a substantial difference, but they don't have any specific numbers.

"I can tell you that we have close to 20,000 passengers every year, which is 20,000 people who aren't driving," Skalla said.

KU's SafeRide is used not only to pick up people who have been drinking but also for students who need a safe ride home from places like the library.

Skalla said she definitely suggests other universities implement a SafeRide program because it will make people feel safer.

"You wouldn't think people would use it, but you would be surprised by how many do people use it," she said.

Other universities that have a similar program are Emporia State University,

Guthrie said the scariest part of the survey was that a majority of the students surveyed said they had driven an automobile after consuming alcohol.

Colorado State University, Fort Hays State University, Iowa State University, University of Missouri, University of Nebraska and the University of Texas at Austin.

Liability also would be a concern if a SafeRide program was implemented.

Jennifer Kassebaum, associate university attorney, said there always is going to be some liability with this type of service. She said the liability risk increases with the amount of responsibility the university has over the program.

"I feel that there is a way that the program can be structured to limit liability," she said.

Guthrie said the best way to decrease the liability risks is to contract the program with an outside company.

"The less control we have over it, the better, as far as the university is concerned," she said.

To get the control out of the university's hands, Mathes said the most feasible plan is to contract a cab company.

"I think it would be appealing to a cab company from the money aspect," she said.

Mathes said implementing a SafeRide program is extremely important to Manhattan and K-State, but there are still many details that need to be worked out.

"I can't think of any fatalities associated with drinking in our community," she said. "But I don't think it should come to that."

record with a $47,000 increase from last year. The second highest was a $23,000 increase in the College of Business Administration. The College of Architecture, Planning and Design also set a record by bringing in a pledge total of $53,892.

"We have a few students helping thousands," Dowell said. "The alumni make this a fun, enjoyable and entertaining activity for the students and are putting money in the college accounts."

Larry Erpelding, associate dean of the College of Agriculture, said 202 students volunteered to help with the Telefund from the college.

Students were organized by a student leader who contacted each of the organizations and developed a team of Telefund coaches. These individuals acquired Telefund callers from their organizations.

"We have a very productive student network that allows us to generate income from the Telefund," Erpelding said.

Erpelding said the College of Agriculture set a new record over last year by raising $157,045 in funds. These funds go to undergraduate scholarships, student enrichment activities and special projects, such as teaching equipment for labs and improving computer technology.

"Some of the reason for our success is due to the excellent student leadership," Erpelding said.

"We had more alumni, and some must have been employed in industrial or government service and able to give a little more," he said.

of appealing the sanction and requesting an Honor Council investigation and hearing.

"The students are always protected," Anderson said. "We believe the system is fair to everybody."

Though the system is ready, Anderson said he hopes it will not be used often.

"I hope that the K-State community takes us seriously enough that we won't have anything to do," Anderson said.

"That is not realistic, though, so we need to be ready."

The goal was for the system to reduce its usefulness over time, Marcoux said.

"I know it's going to take time, because that's a culture, and cultures take time to change," she said. "We might not see the benefits in a year, but slowly, people will see a difference in the pride that students have for their school."

Tracking trip fatal for tourists in Uganda

Rwandan rebels brutally kill, kidnap tourists tracking mountain gorillas.

By HENRY WASSWA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KAMPALA, Uganda — Eight tourists tracking rare mountain gorillas were killed and six others were rescued after being kidnapped by Rwandan rebels. An American survivor said today the rebels brutally hacked some victims to death with machetes.

In Washington, D.C., State Department spokesman James Foley said two Americans were murdered as they were being marched away by their captors.

The remaining six victims were killed the same way, he said.

Foley said the victims cannot be identified until their relatives are notified.

The six released hostages were returned to Kampala and taken to a safe location, he said.

Mark Ross, a tour operator and pilot who was born in Arkansas but has spent years in Africa, told reporters the rebels rounded up tourists from several jungle camps in southwestern Uganda. Ross said he was among those taken captive but was freed later with a political message from the rebels.

The rebels — who came to Uganda after Rwanda's 1994 genocide — marched their captives through the rain forest, where Ross said some were hacked to death Monday. Some captives were freed before Ross who later came upon their remains.

"We came across the first set of bodies. The women that we'd been told would be escorted back had been killed on the spot. It looks like one was raped prior to being killed," he said.

Ross said he saw five bodies, and "the ones that I saw had their heads crushed in and deep slashes."

His account clashed with that of Ugandan police spokesman Eric Naigambi who told The Associated Press there was a shootout and the rescue operation was carried out this morning in a mountainous rain forest made famous in the film "Gorillas in the Mist."

The "tourists were killed in the crossfire during the rescue operation," Naigambi said.

But another Ugandan, Hussein Kivumi, manager of a rain forest camp, said the rebels targeted Americans and Britons.

"They killed four women and four men with knives, machetes and axes. There were no gunshots."

Three Americans, six Britons, three New Zealanders, an Australian and a Swiss woman were among those kidnapped, Ugandan officials said. A Canadian citizen also was taken.

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook said four of the six Britons kidnapped in Uganda were among the dead.

The Ugandan government did not give names or nationalities of the dead but said that those rescued were an American, two British, one Canadian, one Swiss and one New Zealander.

Among those who escaped was Elizabeth Garland, 29, an anthropology student at the University of Chicago. She told her father, James Garland, by telephone that the rebels singled out American and British nationals as hostages.

U.S. Embassy spokesman James Okanya said the U.S. government sent an aircraft to pick up the survivors and bring the bodies to Entebbe Airport outside the capital.

Uganda said four Ugandans — a game warden and three park rangers — were killed when the rebels first raided two tourist camps Sunday. It said the rebels numbered about 130, and its soldiers killed four in a jungle pursuit that continued today.

France's deputy ambassador to Uganda, Anne Peltier, who was among the survivors, said the rebels gave her a message blaming the Americans and British for backing the Tutsis in Rwanda and not "the ethnic Hutu majority."

The tourists were abducted at campgrounds on the edge of Bwindi National Park, known as the Impenetrable Forest, the starting point for visitors hoping to glimpse the 320 mountain gorillas that remain along the border mountain's slopes.

The 1988 film "Gorillas in the Mist" about researcher Dian Fossey was based on her book of the same name and starred Sigourney Weaver as the woman who risked her life in Rwanda trying to save the gorillas from extinction.

Fighting between Rwandan Hutu rebels and the Uganda People's Defense Forces continued today along the forested border in this east African country of 17 million people.

The Hutu rebels fled Rwanda after they took part in a 1994 genocide of more than 500,000 minority Tutsis and politically moderate Hutus.

The rebels are angry at Uganda for supporting the Tutsi-dominated Rwandan government. In August, the rebels kidnapped four tourists and seven Congolese guides on a trek to observe the gorillas.

They later released a Canadian and the Congolese escorts. The others have not been heard from since.

KU professors file lawsuit claiming discrimination

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — A married couple who teach at the University of Kansas filed a federal lawsuit alleging sex and race discrimination by the school and a department chairman.

Cynthia Annett and Raymond Pierotti, who both work for the Department of Ecology and Evolutionary Biology, claim the university and department chairman Thomas Taylor discriminated against Annett by rejecting her bid for tenure and promotion.

The suit, filed late last month in U.S. District Court, also claims that Pierotti, an American Indian, was discriminated against because of his race. The lawsuit seeks more than $400,000 for violations of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Tom Hutton, director of university relations, said Monday that university officials disputed allegations made in the suit.

"However, because it is a personnel matter, I cannot discuss details of the case," he said.

Taylor declined to comment.

Annett, who is white, said winning a large financial judgment in court was not important. Instead, she and her husband want to protect university women and minorities from discrimination.

"What we want is for the university to address this issue, put in administrative protections, seriously look at what's been going on and not just in our department, where there has been a long history of abuse," she said.

Annett, an assistant professor, was denied promotion and tenure in 1998. She claimed sex discrimination after the department voted to recommend that two males be granted tenure. Annett said she had equal or greater academic qualifications than the men but was denied advancement because of her gender.

She also alleged Taylor made unfounded charges of academic misconduct against her.

Annett has a self-nomination bid for tenure pending before the university. If this second attempt at tenure fails, her appointment at the university will terminate in May.

Pierotti, an associate professor, was awarded tenure in 1998. He said Taylor, who is white, revoked Pierotti's control of lab and office space, removed Pierotti as head of the department's minority affairs committee and denigrated Pierotti's award for mentoring minority students.

Both Annett and Pierotti have been on the university's faculty since 1992.

UPC Satellite Theatre Committee sponsors free sneak preview of 'Cruel Intentions'

Anyone can watch a sneak preview of "Cruel Intentions" and live satellite interviews with its stars for free at K-State.

The movie will play at 8 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall. The event is sponsored by Union Program Council and Network Event Theater. NET is a company that works with corporate sponsors to provide free movies to more than 30 colleges across the country.

Matt Scheck, senior in mass communications and UPC Satellite Theatre Committee chairman, said the event is open to the public.

"This show is for anyone who has a pass. You can pick up passes at the UPC office, third floor of the Union," he said.

The film deals with trickery and seduction among wealthy teenagers, said Tim Yeaglin, senior in management information systems and UPC Feature Films Committee chairman.

"The story is kind of a bet on trying to pretty much destroy and sleep with other people," Yeaglin said.

Scheck said the film is full of treacherous characters. "There's a high school girl who uses her power to make others do what she wants them to do," he said.

Yeaglin said "Cruel Intentions" is based on two other movies. "'Cruel Intentions' is actually the third remake of the same story," he said. "It started out as a French film, and the movie 'Dangerous Liaisons' was a remake of that."

Although the story is the same, Yeaglin said "Cruel Intentions" can appeal to today's audiences.

"They bring it to the '90s, lower the age a little bit and make it kind of a 20-something film. There's supposed to be a lot more sex in it too," he said.

Satellite Theatre events usually are quite popular, Yeaglin said, and he said he expects this screening to be no different.

"We just had 'Analyze This' last Wednesday, and we packed Forum Hall, which holds 608," he said. "There were maybe five seats open in the entire theater that were scattered, so we packed it. And this one will pack real quick."

Scheck said he agreed.

"The line usually starts building about an hour before the show, then 45 minutes before, the big line hits."

More tickets are handed out than seats available, he said.

"In the last show, we had out about 750 tickets, and Forum Hall seats only about 600, so not everyone is guaranteed a seat."

K-State viewers can't phone questions like they have in past, Scheck said, but the stars of the film still will be interviewed at the end of the screening.

"For this show there won't be any interactive, but the stars will still be interviewed live via satellite," he said.

Scheck said the satellite equipment provides a high-quality cinematic experience.

"The movies, not just the interview, are played via digital satellite. It's better quality because you don't have to worry about film scratches. You can't really tell the difference between this and a regular movie screen," Scheck said.

Despite large attendance, most don't stay for the interview, Scheck said.

"For the interview, there's probably about a hundred that have stayed. The interview lasts about an hour to an hour and a half. It varies."

Scheck also said moviegoers can expect more previews with NET and UPC.

"'Cruel Intentions' will be the second preview this semester," he said. "We usually do about four shows each time, so we hope to have more in the future."

Broadway star to provide expertise for 'Show Boat'

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During this week's KSU Opera Theatre presentation of "Show Boat," K-State drama students have the opportunity to take instruction from a well-known name in musical theater.

Andre Solomon-Glover, best known for his portrayal of Joe in the Tony-award winning Broadway revival of "Show Boat," has traveled to Manhattan to lend a hand in K-State's version of the play, which will be at 8 tonight and Thursday in McCain Auditorium. "It's neat that a professional would take the time to come here and help us with the production," said Georgette Johnson, freshman in family studies and human services and member of United Black Voices, a vocal group that will sing in the performance.

Marcy Maullar, managing director of KSU Opera Theatre, said many people contributed to Solomon-Glover's travel fund. Donations came from groups such as the Fine Arts Council, the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development, Ebony Theatre Company and the music department.

"We were so happy that the organizations helped us in bringing Andre here," she said. "We couldn't have done this without them."

Solomon-Glover said he was eager to work with K-State's drama department.

"I think I have something to contribute here," he said. "It's nice to be around the young, hopeful actors around here."

While the rest of the cast has been at work on "Show Boat" since early January, Solomon-Glover has been with the cast only since last weekend. However, his familiarity with his role allowed him to fit into rehearsals quickly.

"I perform this role in about 400 shows a year," he said. "However, the role is slightly different each time, so you never get the same performance twice."

In the role of Joe, Solomon-Glover performs "Ol' Man River," the most recognized number in "Show Boat." Solomon-Glover said a deeper meaning can be found for fans of the play.

"People make it into what they need it be," he said. "I think the song is suggesting that life keeps going without regard to what the human population is doing."

Beyond his "Show Boat" success, Solomon-Glover has worked in the musical theater for many years, leaving his mark on roles in performances of operas such as "Carmen" and "Rigoletto" and musical classics such as "Porgy and Bess."

He will give a presentation on his experiences at 3:30 p.m. today in Nichols Theatre. The speech is open to all students.

Solomon-Glover said that in the speech, he definitely will express his love for the profession he has found such happiness in.

"It's tough, but it's what I was born to do," Solomon-Glover said. "There's nothing else that I was sent here to do and to talk to people through."

'8mm' a fierce thriller, hard on viewer's emotions

By JEFF ELLIOTT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"8mm" is the movie that everyone will be talking about.

The film casts Academy Award-winner Nicholas Cage ("The Rock," "Leaving Las Vegas") as Tom Welles, a surveillance specialist with a solid reputation for getting to the bottom of things.

After Welles is hired by the elderly widow of a millionaire to investigate the contents of a mysterious reel of film found in her late husband's safe, his modest life is turned upside down as he is sucked into a nightmare that leaves his family hanging in the balance.

The reel of film, which is an amateur taping of a young girl being brutally raped and killed, forces Welles to enter the grisly world of underground pornography to find answers about the girl's identity and the circumstances surrounding her cruel death.

The movie, directed by Joel Schumacher ("Batman & Robin") and written by screenwriter Andrew Kevin Walker, is unusually dark. Much like Walker's masterpiece "Seven," the dreary film hardly contains any scenes that involve sunlight and contains a depressing inner-city undertone.

One aspect that separates "8mm" from other mainstream thrillers is Schumacher's determination to give the audience an unprecedented look at the hardcore world of underground porn and expose them to the harsh realities that most people don't want to talk about.

The film is rated 'R,' but almost nothing is taboo, and few things are left to the imagination. In his quest for justice, Welles ventures through the foulest sex shops in New York and comes across several home videos called "snuff films" that depict women being tortured and killed. This all-too-real footage along with the movie's grim, sex-infested setting makes "8mm" one of the most fiercely intense box office releases ever.

Despite its controversial subject matter, "8mm" is a good movie. The film keeps you on the edge of your seat, and the combination of horror and suspense along with Michael Danna's ("The Sweet Hereafter") clever musical score make the film a solid thriller.

However, "8mm" has its problems. Even though the film has little nudity, the graphic imagery depicted in the film may make the audience uncomfortable. Few moviegoers will be able to sit through the film's 2 1/2 hours without grimacing at the rough content portrayed on the screen. Because "8mm" is centered around pornography and violence, most audience members will walk away from the theater feeling emotionally drained.

"8mm" is worth seeing because it is well written, and the movie's cast and crew have accomplished the task of putting together an excellent thriller. On the other hand, because of its graphic nature and focus on the pornography aspect of the film, "8mm" won't have as many repeat viewers as other popular thrillers of the past.

Kansas couple opposes state government

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — An attorney promises to make freedom of speech an issue in the trial of a woman whose husband claims to be the state's lawful governor.

Paula Christine Drake and Mark Kline Drake both face misdemeanor criminal charges stemming from an unauthorized meeting and scuffle with Capitol police Jan. 11. The incident occurred shortly after the inauguration of Gov. Bill Graves for his second term.

The Drakes, who live outside the small town of Rock in Cowley County, do not recognize state government as legitimate. They operate a Supreme Court of Christian Jurisdiction, which claims the right to indict public officials for treason and other offenses.

Trials for the Drakes are scheduled to begin 1:30 p.m. Wednesday in Shawnee County District Court. Mark Kline Drake has no attorney, but Paula Christine Drake is represented by Dennis Hawver of Ozawie.

Hawver said Tuesday he will ask for a jury trial for Mrs. Drake. He also said he believes the Drakes and others who participated with them in the Jan. 11 meeting were exercising constitutionally protected political rights.

"Any of us get to go to the State Capitol building and inaugurate the King of Asia if that's our political belief," he said. "It smacks of some place other than Kansas, and I don't like it."

Both Drakes spent more than a month in jail even though the charges against them were misdemeanors and bail was only $500.

District Attorney Joan Hamilton said it was unusual to have a trial after someone has served enough jail time, but she said Mark Kline Drake could have left custody by cooperating.

Paula Christine Drake faces the obstruction and unauthorized meeting charges, as well as a single charge of battery of a law enforcement officer. The battery charge is punishable by up to six months in jail.

State law gives the Legislature control of the Statehouse, so that its leaders can allocate space for public meetings. A policy limits Capitol meetings to state agencies, non-profit groups staging educational meetings and groups sponsored by legislators.

The Legislature has rejected meeting applications from a group affiliated with the Drakes, the Kansas Territorial Agricultural Society. The society's members, from six to 10 in number, have met in the rotunda several times.

"They have to follow the rules of the road," Hamilton said.

Hawver noted previous rotunda meetings involving the Drakes have been peaceful. The Drakes described the Jan. 11 meeting as a swearing-in ceremony for Mark Kline Drake.

"They weren't interfering with the inauguration," Hawver said. "Who said they could sic the cops on them?"

Candidates stress need for library funding

Salary increases also top agenda

By JOEY ECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The need for leadership from outside the regular loop is Justin VanNest and Amanda Olson's reason for running for student body president and vice president.

VanNest, senior in political science, and Olson, freshman in fine arts, have both had prior interests in politics.

SGA
1999
ELECTIONS
MARCH 8-10

"I've always had an interest in politics," Olson said. "I was in student council in junior high and high school."

"Dinnertime discussions at my house were always about what's going on in the country," VanNest said. "My family's just always been about politics."

The biggest issue on the two candidates' platform deals with the funding of Hale Library.

Currently, VanNest said, the library building itself is being paid for partially by privilege fees.

He and Olson said there needs to be another privilege fee allocated for the contents of the library.

"Students don't realize that just because the building is finished and looks nice that the inside still needs help," Olson said.

VanNest said there aren't materials in Hale that directly affect every student, which is why the two feel the library should get more funding.

Faculty salaries is another area in which VanNest and Olson feel the university is inadequate.

"The best educators will not come to K-State because they won't get paid well," he said. "This affects the quality of education at the university and in turn, has an effect on the quality of your diploma."

Olson said the low salaries are part of the reason for the overabundance of graduate teaching assistants at K-State.

"If you can't pay a professor, the next best thing is a GTA," she said.

VanNest and Olson propose the best way to solve the salary problem is for Student Senate and the student body to let state legislators know that change is wanted, and faculty need to be paid what they deserve.

A third issue on their platform is the allocation of privilege fees. Olson said a review of exactly who is getting how much would benefit students immensely.

Justin VanNest, senior in political science, is running for student body president along with running mate Amanda Olson, freshman in fine arts. Hale Library is the main issue on the candidates' platform.

"Almost no students realize what all their privilege fees are paying for," she said.

VanNest said Lafene Health Center is operating right now with a $250,000 debt. He said he felt Lafene should be allocated more privilege-fee money to cover its operating budget.

"Lafene offers free visits and reduced prescription costs," Olson said.

If Lafene is not allocated more funds, then service costs will have to be raised and there may not be any more free consultations, VanNest said.

With campaign finance, the candidates say they want to make it easier for anyone to run, not just students who have a lot of money to spend.

"I think it's intimidating to some candidates," Olson said, referring to some candidates having more money to spend on T-shirts and advertising.

VanNest and Olson agree that because of the closeness and condensed layout of Aggieville, the SafeRide issue is not a pressing at this time.

"It's a huge expenditure that the school might not be able to afford," Olson said.

Both VanNest and Olson want to stress to students that, if elected, they will be there to make sure Student Governing Association listens to students.

"We want people to know that we are available and we will listen," VanNest said.

Court upholds anti-carjacking law

By RICHARD CARELLI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court preserved the broad sweep of a federal anti-carjacking law Tuesday, rejecting a legal challenge that would have limited it to cases in which robbers intend to hurt their victims no matter what.

The court, by a 7-2 vote, ruled the law also covers crimes committed with the "conditional intent" of harming victims who refuse to comply with the robbers' demands.

The decision upheld the federal carjacking conviction of a New York man who insists he never intended to seriously hurt people whose cars he stole at gunpoint.

As amended by Congress in 1994, the law makes it a crime to take a motor vehicle by force "with the intent to cause death or serious bodily harm."

Francois Holloway, sentenced to 50 years in prison for his part in a carjacking ring that sold parts of stolen vehicles dismantled in a Queens "chop shop," challenged his conviction by arguing he never harbored such an intent.

But Justice John Paul Stevens wrote for the court, "The intent requirement ... is satisfied when the government proves that at the moment the defendant demanded or took control over the driver's automobile the defendant possessed the intent to seriously harm or kill the driver if necessary to steal the car."

Prosecutors said Holloway, on at least three occasions in the fall of 1994, confronted motorists with a gun and demanded they surrender their car keys.

An accomplice testified their plan was to steal cars without harming the drivers but said he would have used his weapon if any of the victims had given him a "hard time."

The federal judge who presided over Holloway's trial told jurors they could find the required intent if they thought Holloway would have seriously hurt victims who did not comply with his demands. The conviction was upheld by a federal appeals court.

Stevens said such a common-sense interpretation of the law is what Congress intended, but Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas disagreed. In separate dissenting opinions, each said the law's wording makes it clear Congress meant to zero in on crimes where the intent was certain, not conditional.

In an extraordinarily rare personal reference, Scalia wrote, "I have a friend whose father was killed, and whose mother was nearly killed, in just such an incident — after the car had already been handed over. It is not at all implausible that Congress should direct its attention to this particularly savage sort of carjacking — where killing the driver is part of the intended crime."

In other matters Tuesday, the court: ■ Said in a Pennsylvania case that federal prison inmates are not entitled to be resentenced every time a judge fails to tell them of their rights to appeal but only when that error results in real harm.

■ Ruled in an Arizona case that states can impose taxes on federal contractors for work they do on American

In an extraordinarily rare personal reference, Scalia wrote, "I have a friend whose father was killed, and whose mother was nearly killed, in just such an incident ... It is not all implausible that Congress should direct its attention to this particularly savage sort of carjacking."

Indian reservations.

■ Heard arguments in a California case in which the justices are to decide by late June whether gifts given to federal officials can be considered illegal gratuities without proof they were intended to influence any particular action.

At issue is an agricultural cooperative's invalidated conviction for giving gifts to former Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy, who was acquitted of taking gifts.

Fair features exhibits; Snyder keynote speaker

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Criminology Fair is from 9:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. today in the Grand Ballroom of the K-State Student Union.

There will be about 40 exhibitors, which is twice the number that attended last year.

WHERE?

The Criminology Fair is from 9:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. today in the Grand Ballroom of the K-State Student Union.

The fair is sponsored by the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work, Career and Employment Services and the K-State chapter of the National Law Enforcement Officers Association.

There will be organizations from Colorado, Missouri and Nebraska, with the majority of exhibits set up by Kansas groups. The Kansas Highway Patrol, the Department of Corrections and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation will attend, along with the K-State Police, the Geary County Community Corrections and the Topeka Police Department.

The fair also has a luncheon from noon to 1 p.m. in the Grand Ballroom. The keynote speaker for the luncheon is head football coach Bill Snyder.

"The fair is open to anyone," Williams said. "Most of the people who attend have a direct interest in criminology, but there are students from other areas. Students in biology might come because of an interest in forensics."

Local businesses and exhibitors donated items that will be raffled at the event, and the proceeds of the raffle will pay for two criminology-program scholarships.

New calendar committee to assess fall break

By JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Past proposals for a fall break have failed, but within the next year or two, a new committee might help make a fall break possible.

Student Senate has debated the issue of implementing a fall break for several months, but a workable plan has not been found, Audrey Umphenour, a student at large member of Academic Affairs Committee, said.

Umphenour said she and a small group of people have been working on creating a calendar committee to do more research about a fall break and to eventually develop a proposal.

"We're not necessarily designing a specific proposal now," Umphenour said.

At a meeting Tuesday night, the details of the calendar committee were worked out, Faculty Senate President Talat Rahman said. The proposal for the committee will go before Student Senate within the next two weeks, she said.

The calendar committee will be a standing committee of two representatives appointed by Faculty Senate and two appointed by Student Senate. Registrar Don Foster will chair the committee, Rahman said.

The committee will present annual reports to Student and Faculty senates.

Rahman said she hopes the committee will meet regularly to research options for a calendar change that would include a fall break. If the committee is able to research an effective fall break schedule, Rahman said she thinks a calendar change could be possible in 2000.

Academic Affairs Chairman Rhett Trujillo said Faculty Senate has not agreed with past proposals because of the calendar changes they presented.

"We've been working on a different way to package a fall break that the faculty are more inclined to agree with,"

Trujillo said.

One option, like the proposal the University of Kansas has presented to its student government, is to come back to school two days early. Rahman said she thinks shortening summer break to allow for a fall break is a bad idea.

"It would be more productive if we didn't begin school earlier," she said. "That way, we could finish what we're doing in the summer."

She said faculty members use the summer months to do research and other things they didn't have time to do during the school year.

Shortening summer or winter break also could cause problems with summer school, intersession and internships, Umphenour said.

Also, coming back two days early would require students in residence halls to pay for four more days of housing because school would start on a Thursday, Rahman said. She said students would have to move in Wednesday instead of Sunday.

"Coming early is not making sense," Rahman said. "Faculty and students will resist beginning the semester two days early."

Umphenour said she thinks it's important that a fall break be implemented despite the complications with changing the calendar schedule. She also said she thinks there is a need to restructure Martin Luther King Jr. weekend so students don't start spring semester on a Thursday and have two unproductive days of school.

The calendar committee will be beneficial for helping to solve these problems, she said. The committee will be able to deal with future problems once a fall break is in place, and Faculty Senate will respect the committee's opinion because of the research that would be done.

Another option is a one-day fall break instead of two days. Rahman said the university is required to have classes 75 days each semester, but K-State has classes 76 days each semester.

She said she thinks a plan could be developed to have a one-day fall break without any big changes to the calendar. But a two-day break will be harder to put together.

"We can't teach less than 75 days," Rahman said. "For a two-day break in the fall, we must start early or end late."

Trujillo said he doesn't think student government will move on the issue of a fall break this year.

He said he thinks it will wait until fall. A proposal for a fall break failed last spring, but Trujillo said he thinks the timing was wrong.

Bringing up the proposal in the spring, when a fall break wasn't fresh on people's minds, was the reason it failed, he said.

"The issue's success is going to depend on timing," he said. "It's more appropriate to bring it up in the fall."

Any proposals created will have to be approved by the Kansas Board of Regents because they would involve a calendar change, Trujillo said.

He said he hopes a proposal will be brought before Faculty Senate in October so there is enough time for a fall break to be implemented by the following year.

"I think it will provide students and faculty some time to recharge in that fall semester," Trujillo said. "It's a really long stretch of school."

Trujillo said faculty and students would be able to use the break as they choose.

"It's nice to have a little vacation between school," he said. "It gives students a chance to catch up academically."

The College of Veterinary Medicine has had a fall break for at least 10 years, Associate Dean Ron Elmore said.

Senate plan calls for salary increase

By JESSICA THOMAS AND CRISTY ANDERSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Senate Ways and Means Committee endorsed a proposal Wednesday to increase university faculty salaries by nearly $900,000 more than Gov. Bill Graves' plan.

The plan proposed by the committee would raise faculty salaries by an average of between 4.8 and 5 percent, up from the 4.5 percent proposed by Graves and the 4 percent recommended by the House Appropriations Committee two weeks ago.

Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, said the proposal was made after evidence was presented by the Kansas Board of Regents that salaries were not up to par.

"The Board of Regents have indicated with statistics that they are not able to pay faculty competitive salaries," Kerr said. "As a result, they are losing a number of people, especially those reaching the tenured level."

Barb Conant, director of communications at the board of regents, said each university sent the regents examples of faculty leaving for pay increases and other benefits.

"Often, when they get a job at another school, in addition to a higher salary, they get better instructional support and more grant support, and sometimes their children get free tuition," Conant said.

She said the regents schools do not stack up well when compared to similar universities.

"At the six regents schools in the state, faculty are about 12 percent below, on average, the salaries of faculty at their peer schools," Conant said.

Conant said Kansas universities not only are losing good faculty, but the faculty often are taking their research and grant money with them when they leave.

Conant said the regents made faculty salary increases their highest priority and took the problem to the Legislature and the public, Conant said.

Graves originally proposed $2.5 million for faculty-salary increases, and the Senate committee proposed $3.4 million. However, the House committee was not convinced of the regents faculty turnover statistics and reduced Graves' proposal for faculty salaries to $1 million two

Binge drinking target of new health grant

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State received a $450,000 grant from the Kansas Health Foundation to make the campus safer and healthier. The money will focus on weaning students away from heavy drinking.

The program will expose students to consistent and credible messages concerning drinking at K-State, said Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education at University Counseling Services.

"The grant is not looking to stop drinking by any means," Arck said. "We know that happens in college. We want to reduce some of the problems that arise when heavy drinking occurs."

Arck said the money will be used to create a positive message campaign. The purpose of the grant is to educate students of the consequences of high-risk drinking behavior.

"We're not cracking down on anything like that. We aren't hiring more cops or security," he said. "We're just trying to make K-State students happy and healthy."

K-State will model its program after programs installed at Northern Illinois University, the University of Arizona and the University of Missouri. The programs at these three universities have been successful, Arck said.

More than 1,000 students will be surveyed before spring break, which will help determine K-State students' drinking behavior. Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, said the survey will get a cross-section of the population by sampling different colleges and levels of classes.

University Counseling Services said the surveys probably will show a substantial gap between what students think goes on around campus and what actually does occur.

Newton said the goal is to promote an understanding of what really happens and to publicize the normal behavior.

"All students think all other students are heavy drinkers and partiers," he said. "In reality, studies show that most students drink moderately."

Once the surveys are finished, the grant will work on presenting the information publicly and truthfully, Newton said. Focus groups and more follow-up surveys will help keep the program's pulse on K-State students.

This particular grant focuses on public health, said Mary K. Campuzano, vice president for programs for the Kansas Health Foundation.

"We hope we will see an improvement in health due to a decrease in heavy drinking," she said. "We want this money to help schools address drinking on campus."

Lewinsky highlights affairs in interview, book

By JOHN SOLOMON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Disclosing an abortion and thoughts of suicide, Monica Lewinsky gave the world an unabashed account of her life Wednesday and unleashed her long-pent-up loathing for Kenneth Starr's investigation. She said she now regards President Clinton "to be a much bigger liar than I ever thought."

In a television interview and a separate book, the 25-year-old former White House intern spoke openly of sexual encounters with the president and several other men.

But she saved some of her sharpest words for the prosecutor who transformed her affair with Clinton into an impeachment crisis while providing her immunity from criminal charges.

Lewinsky said in her book, "Monica's

Story," that Starr's office "was sick" for asking so many detailed questions about her sexual encounters with the president and also engaged in "dubious tactics" by trying to coerce her cooperation during a first confrontation in January 1998.

She said in her book that first meeting made her so distraught she considered hurling herself from the 10th floor window of the hotel room where prosecutors interviewed her, and later weighed fleeing the country with her mother.

Even now with a promise from prosecutors that she won't be charged, she is "afraid of doing something to lose my immunity," she told Barbara Walters on ABC in a long-anticipated show aired Wednesday night.

Showing Americans a far different personality from that of the stern witness forced to testify before a grand jury and by videotape at the impeachment trial, Lewinsky was animated and smiled frequently during the TV interview.

Once, while recounting the pain the crisis has caused her family, she broke down crying. "People have no idea about what this has done. ... It was so destructive," she said, tears streaming.

Both the Clintons left Washington for a day their friends and aides admitted would be painful — the president went to a fundraiser in New Jersey; the first lady tested the political waters in New York, where she's considering a bid for U.S. Senate.

Lewinsky's book, written by Princess Diana biographer Andrew Morton with the former intern's cooperation, criticized Starr for obtaining a copy of her false affidavit denying an affair with Clinton before it was filed in court.

The book accuses the prosecutor of colluding with Paula Jones in obtaining the affidavit. Documents obtained by The Associated Press show Starr recently told Congress that he had gotten an early copy from a lawyer for Linda Tripp and not from Jones' camp.

Jones' lawyers had been given a copy of the affidavit four days before the Starr episode. Asked Wednesday about the affidavit, Tripp's spokesman, Philip Coughter, said his client "has no comment on the matter at this time."

The Justice Department is investigating whether Starr's prosecutors improperly discussed a possible immunity agreement with Lewinsky without her attorney present and failed to disclose contacts with Jones' lawyers to the department before it gave Starr permission to investigate.

Student sues KU fraternity, says hazing incident put him in coma

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — A student has sued a University of Kansas fraternity, claiming that a 1997 hazing incident left him in an alcohol-induced coma.

Matthew Prime filed the lawsuit against Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity last week in Douglas County District Court. Also named as defendants are several leaders of the fraternity at the time, the university, the Kansas Board of Regents and the Mount Oread House Corp., which holds title to the chapter house.

Prime seeks more than $375,000.

According to the lawsuit, Prime attended an event called "Pledge Dad Night" on Feb. 26, 1997, at the fraternity house, a ritual that was part of the membership process of the KU Pi Kappa Alpha chapter. According to the lawsuit, pledges in the chapter are "encouraged and coerced" to drink large quantities of liquor and beer as a "de facto requirement of membership."

Prime eventually passed out, and at 1 a.m. fraternity members took him to a hospital emergency room, where he was "comatose from alcohol poisoning for approximately 12 hours," the lawsuit said.

Prime's blood-alcohol level was 0.375 percent when he arrived at the hospital, the lawsuit said. The legal limit is 0.08 percent.

Spencer Staudenmyer, fraternity president, did not return a phone message Wednesday from The Associated Press seeking comment.

The university suspended Pi Kappa Alpha for two years as a result of the incident involving Prime, university spokesman Tom Hutton said Tuesday. As part of the suspension, he said, the fraternity has been working with university officials to reinstate the chapter.

"University officials have been working closely with a number of the fraternities to encourage them to be alcohol-free," Hutton said. "I think we are up to seven fraternities that have agreed to go alcohol-free by 2000."

El Paso mayor tells Senate to expand U.S. Highway 54

TOPEKA — El Paso Mayor Carlos Rameriz told a Senate committee Wednesday that Kansas should make U.S. Highway 54 a four-lane highway from Wichita to the Oklahoma border so it can be part of a trade corridor to the Mexican border.

"To get products to market, you need the most direct route, and now there's a bottleneck on I-35," Rameriz told the Transportation and Tourism Committee. "This country must maintain a competitive edge, and transportation helps maintain that edge."

After the mayor of the Texas border city spoke to the committee, Chairman Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, said one way to finance the widening of U.S. 54 would be to have part of it financed by tolls.

"It would be impossible to four-lane the whole section without tolls because there is no money in any plan for it," Vidricksen said. "Trucking companies will save money, even with toll roads."

The portion of U.S. 54 under discussion goes from Wichita to Liberal, then through the Oklahoma and Texas panhandles, to New Mexico and south through Tucumcari to El Paso. The 741-mile route is the most traveled two-lane highway in the United States, Rameriz said.

He said the highway is a favorite for truckers because it cuts the travel time between El Paso and Wichita. If it was widened, it would mean more trucks could travel it in shorter time.

Rameriz said that since the North American Free Trade Agreement was implemented in 1994, U.S.-Mexican trade has increased 56 percent through Texas ports of entry.

Commissioners urge sheriff to resign amid controversy

TOPEKA — Shawnee County commissioners said they want the sheriff to resign amid questions about how much he knew of a former deputy's cocaine addiction and the disappearance of drugs from an evidence locker.

Meanwhile, Sheriff Dave Meneley is digging in, alleging that a local newspaper and the mayor of Topeka are involved in a conspiracy to discredit him. He said he has no intention of resigning.

The mayor replied that the sheriff is "out of control," and Topeka's police chief expressed concern about Meneley's promise to make life uncomfortable for "some high officials."

The three county commissioners called for Meneley's resignation Tuesday and were poised to approve a letter at their meeting scheduled for today formally asking him to step down.

"Please accept this formal request from the Board of Shawnee County Commissioners for your resignation as Shawnee County sheriff," began the letter that commissioners have placed on their agenda.

Cpl. Timothy Oblander, who resigned as a deputy on Friday, admitted Monday that he had been addicted to cocaine and lied about it, including under oath. He previously said he had sought treatment for alcoholism.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation issued a report suggesting that Oblander was the suspect in the cocaine theft, but the KBI concluded there was not enough evidence to warrant criminal charges against anyone.

During an appearance on a local radio show Tuesday, Meneley said he has no intention of resigning office.

Kansas cattlemen claim economic discrimination

TOPEKA — Western Kansas cattlemen told the Senate Agriculture Committee they are at a competitive disadvantage — and fighting for their economic lives — because meatpackers discriminate against them in what they pay for live cattle.

They want a bill passed that would require daily cattle price disclosure, prohibit discrimination in what packers pay different producers and forbid business retaliation against producers for statements they make about packers.

Producers from St. Francis, Meade, Johnson and Brewster said they are getting bottom dollar for their cattle — regardless of quality — because four large packing companies control nearly 90 percent of the market.

Consumers are the victims just as much as the producers, they said, because packers and processors are raking in massive profits by paying low prices to producers and charging high prices at the supermarket.

"U.S. demand for beef today exceeds U.S. domestic supply," said Mike Callicrate, who operates a 12,000-head commercial feedlot near St. Francis.

Mike Schultz of Brewster said small producers are threatened because of what he called "the greed of the big packers."

Two planes nearly collide after losing radio contact

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Air traffic controllers were unable to contact the pilots of two large cargo planes as their paths converged 33,000 feet over central Kansas, a controller said Wednesday.

The reason for the lack of radio contact was one key question as the National Transportation Safety Board investigated Tuesday's close call. One crew estimated the two jets missed each other by 100 to 300 feet, while other estimates put the distance at a half-mile or more.

"This was very rare," said Howard Blankenship, representative of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association at the Kansas City Air Route Traffic Control Center in nearby Olathe, Kan.

"The fact that both of them were out of radio contact, both at the same altitude at the same point in time — it's very rare, unbelievable," Blankenship said.

NTSB air safety investigator Jim Silliman said the incident Tuesday morning involved a Federal Express DC-10 bound from Portland, Ore., to Memphis, Tenn., and an American International Airways L-1011 en route from Los Angeles to Indianapolis.

Controllers at the center in suburban Kansas City saw the two planes merge into a single target on radar when they were about 30 miles west of Salina, Kan., Blankenship said.

"When we asked if he had had to take any evasive action, he said no, it was too late when the airplane went right in front of him there," Blankenship said.

Interior secretary promises to resolve trust fund misuse

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt, cited for contempt of court over his handling of $3 billion in American Indian trust funds, promised lawmakers Wednesday he would do his best to resolve the matter.

Key Senate Republicans were skeptical and said they did not believe the Interior Department could manage the money properly.

Babbitt is the latest in a series of Interior secretaries to struggle with reconciling the funds, which were mismanaged for decades by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

"There seems to be an institutional rot that does not go away," said Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell, chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee.

Last week, a federal judge found Babbitt and Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin in contempt of court over their delay in producing documents sought by American Indian account holders suing the government.

"I am ready to accept responsibility for what's happened in the past," Babbitt said at a joint hearing of Campbell's committee and the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. Cleaning up the funds would be his highest priority, he said.

There are 300,000 accounts held by individual American Indians and 1,500 more tribal accounts worth $2.5 billion. The money includes lease revenue, royalties and court settlements.

Death of Kurdish leader does not dim rebels' hopes

ANKARA, Turkey — Kurdish rebels will escalate the war for autonomy in southeastern Turkey despite the loss of their leader, a spokeswoman for the rebels' political wing said Wednesday.

Turkey hoped that the Feb. 15 capture of Abdullah Ocalan, founder and leader of the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK, would deal a final blow to his rebels. But fighting has continued in the southeast, and the Germany-based Kurdish agency DEM said the rebels had killed 29 soldiers since clashes over the past 10 days.

"Since it is clear that Turkey does not want a political dialogue, war will escalate. There is clearly no other way," said rebel spokeswoman Mizgin Sen by telephone from Brussels, Belgium.

The military refused to confirm the report that 29 soldiers had been killed. Earlier, it announced that clashes in the same area had killed 16 rebels.

Etiquette workshop to benefit students

■ Good manners may help students in job interviews.

By LORI OLEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Etiquette and correct dining manners might increase the chances of getting a job offer from a prospective employer.

Students will have a chance to polish their dining skills at the spring Dining Etiquette Workshop at 5 p.m. today in the Derby Food Center Gold Room. The workshop, which is coordinated by Career and Employment Services, has 130 students registered.

Pat Pesci, director of hotel and restaurant management program, will facilitate the event by teaching etiquette do's and don'ts.

"The workshop is hands-on practice," Pesci said.

"My job is not to be an etiquette policeman, but instead I walk around and see things that are going on and talk about those things and answer questions."

Many prospective employers will interview in a dining setting by the second or third interview, said Caroline Fox, Career and Employment Services graduate assistant adviser and event coordinator.

"A lot of times the second interview is on-site and you might have breakfast, lunch and dinner with recruiters," she said.

"A main thing to remember during these meals is that you're always being evaluated, and the pressure of making a wrong move is always there."

Pesci said etiquette and dining manners are becoming increasingly important to companies.

"You see a lot of workshops similar to this being done at the corporate level, and this wasn't the case 10 years ago," Pesci said. "Corporations will spend big bucks to bring in similar workshops."

Confidence during a dining interview could increase the chances of getting the job offer, Pesci said.

"It's important to have some social graces," Pesci said. "This could be a differentiating force if résumés, experience and everything else is even between candidates."

Fox said some students have already been taught dining etiquette but still benefit from refresher courses and practice.

"Society is on the go, and people are pressed for time," Pesci said.

"People don't sit down at a table, break bread and talk together. We don't normally have an opportunity to practice these things, so consequently it's not as important."

Using common sense during a dining interview is the best advice, Pesci said.

"One common mistake people make is talking with food in their mouths because they don't even think about it," Pesci said.

"Another big concern is the napkin and what to do with it — we talk about all of that at the workshop."

Velasquez, Klein focus on faculty, SafeRide

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aaron Velasquez and Brad Klein are two candidates who are tired of hearing students complain.

"If students have an idea, they can bring it to us," said Velasquez, senior in electronic engineering. "Express an idea, express a need, but don't just complain about it."

Their campaign deals with issues as they come. They said they will wait for students to bring up issues rather than tell students what the issues are.

"We don't have any issues. If people want to bring up small issues, they can. But we just don't think the major issues will get accomplished," Velasquez said.

The idea of running for student government came to Velasquez when he was eating lunch with Klein, sophomore in family studies, human services and social work.

"At first I thought he was kidding, but then I was like, 'All right, let's do it.' How hard can it be to be president at K-State?" Klein said.

Both said it felt like the right thing to do. Klein said his running mate would be a good president because he's friendly and he can listen to other people.

"He's just a good leader. He knows how to get things done," Klein said.

Velasquez said to be president, one has to be able to listen, to juggle a lot of things and have a willingness to work.

He said he learned to do all this by being responsible for paying his tuition.

"Being able to work to pay for school is a tough thing to do," Velasquez said.

He said Klein would be a good vice president because he can talk a lot and express a lot of ideas. Although neither have any political background, they said honesty is their biggest asset.

Aaron Velasquez (right), senior in electrical engineering, and Brad Klein, sophomore in family studies and human services and social work, said they want students to express ideas when they see a problem, not just sit around and complain about it.

"If it's a big issue, and we think it's probably not going to happen, we'll tell the students no," Klein said.

One of these issues is the library fee. Velasquez said that even though it's an important issue, and he favors a general tuition increase, students complain too much about it.

Klein said they would look into this issue, but that it isn't the top thing on their list right now.

"I don't think we can have a bake sale and pay for the library fund," Klein said.

The other issue was SafeRide.

Velasquez said most of K-State would benefit from having a program like that. Although Klein said they were unsure how they would go about creating a SafeRide program, he said it is a necessity.

"You read the paper and count the DUIs each morning," Klein said. "It would be a wise thing to have the program."

Neither candidate favored starting school early to allow for a fall break. Both said it is not necessary, and it won't be a concern of theirs. What they are concerned with is playing it by ear and taking it one step at a time, Klein said.

When asked what they would do if they had the power to change anything they wanted to, faculty was their chief concern.

Velasquez said he wants faculty to get better salaries without putting a strain on the students. Klein said teachers should be made more aware of the positive feedback they get from students who fill out the observation cards.

The easiest issue, they said, probably will be the SafeRide program.

"But the hardest issue is the idea of citywide transportation. I don't see it necessary. It's a pretty small town," Velasquez said.

He also said he wants to encourage students to go to the debates and look at all the candidates. Klein said he agrees.

"You might as well go out and vote," Klein said.

Fall break sales pitch misleads students

However popular it might be, the idea of a fall break recently has become more of a political gimmick than a reality.

Students seeking elected office repeatedly campaign with the platform of allowing students days off in the fall. Most recently, the proposal has been to add two days to a weekend in October.

Unfortunately, that's how it's sold to students. It often lacks the disclaimer,

"Oh, and you lose two days of summer, too." Candidates also fail to mention just how often the proposal has died when presented to Faculty Senate.

As far as election issues go, this one is pretty thin.

Fall break is simply not the cure-all that it's being made out to be. Of course, many students would like a break during the long stretch of fall classes. But before this becomes a reality, officials in Student Governing Association must be able to show a benefit to both student and faculty.

Students who are listening to campaigners must remember that the decision is not whether they get a long weekend, but rather whether they are willing to give up some of their summer for a long weekend

Ken Wells—Can you look a little tougher in your picture?

I find it interesting that the Collegian has plenty of time to review "Hemipilation 2" but not enough time to review the theater department's production of "A Perfect Ganesh." I guess you have to pick your priorities, though, don't you?

If we're going to raise tuition, why don't we raise it $2 so we can pay our teachers more?

In the past, Kansas State's dance program has been lacking. I just wanted to say what a great job the dance faculty is doing to bring it up to the Big 12 standards.

I think somebody has to do something to bring independent students and students in the greek system closer together. K-State needs to organize more social events and functions for all students to attend together without being affiliated with their house or dorm.

I do believe we have more squirrels than parking spaces on campus.

To whoever phoned in and called greets 1-800-RENT-A-FRIENDS, I'm sorry your call got cut off last time.

If you get caught in an empty municipal swimming pool, should the police arrest you for criminal trespass or just congratulate you on a creative dating scheme?

I was reading the Collegian last week and read the still-running cartoon, "Conspiracy Theory," and weighed that with the new cartoon, "L-Dopa." I thought that "L-Dopa," by far, was the better cartoon because it actually had humor. How did "Conspiracy Theory" last another semester, anyway?

I just got done reading Danedri's column, "Falling Down," and one word just kept striking me, and that was: hypocrite.

I think we ought to forget the Wal-Mart Supercenter and maybe get a Target.

PRODUCT of PATIENCE

Sound financial planning can provide security and strength to meet an uncertain future

For most college youth, financial planning and thoughts about retirement are put in the category of either "not a problem" or "not a solution." These attitudes are products of a person who has not yet experienced the rewards of solid financial forethought.

As young adults, most college-age students do not spend their free time looking over IRA plans, mutual-fund yields or other forms of investment. While this might be truly impractical for the financial situation of college students, the worth of financial-planning habits and attitudes pay off perhaps even more the sooner a person starts.

Yes, before one has steady employment or has made a long-term commitments such as marriage and/or kids, specific commitments toward retirement and nest-eggs are relatively vain. Yet one cannot stave off these issues for every good, and knowledge about what it takes to start a quality financial plan will help hone one into preparation for the initial shock of suddenly asking one's self, "Where did the time go?"

Such financial responsibility can be simply too troublesome. The issue here is not necessarily laziness, but timeliness. The burden of this responsibility might not jive with some people's current lifestyle. Old habits are hard to break, and if financial concern is not already a part of one's routines, then the trouble of reorganizing one's economic attitudes outweighs the perceived benefit of financial planning.

The future benefits of good finances can lose importance in the face of what is convenient and what is habit. Unfortunately, from this perspective, the benefits of financial planning are not truly understood in the long term.

As an investment matures, its age contributes to its potential worth. One's attitudes, even if they are not consistent with sound financial planning, must accept the reality of what long-term planning entails. This reality cannot be ignored just for the sake of inconvenience.

Yet, as a citizen of the United States and with the support of federal and work-related programs, there exists in our society built-in cushions for economic pitfalls. Governmental plans like Social Security and retirement pensions, along with other employer programs, help ensure an old age that promotes financial independence and economic security.

Under these programs' umbrella, one can depend on an income after retirement and during emergencies. Unfortunately, it assumes that one's job has the long-term security on which to build a reasonable pension. It is also dependent on governmental and economic stability where policy changes by Congress won't corrupt one's social investment.

These external programs, as compared to individual strategies for financial investment, are not planning in the true sense, since they are removed from the individual's influence by employers or the government. A nest egg prepared directly by an individual can be customized to fit individual—not employer or governmental—needs.

Nevertheless, the real problem involved in financial planning is that one truly cannot know what is going to happen in the economic future. There are too many variables in this chaotic world upon which to predict accurately what could happen in the next 20 years, two months or two days.

Financial planning, then, is an exercise in futurity that eventually coincides with the future but ultimately is nothing more than an economic raindance.

Success in financial planning is like an educated guess, and it tricks people into believing that they can control their destiny and that the world is no more than an impressive formula, awaiting simplification and mastery.

By not planning, one can focus on the present and preserve a mentality that is not confused by the undefined future but develops a relationship with its lack of definition. This understanding of what is not rational gives off a confidence not based on a blind acceptance of a financial plan's false sense of security but allows one to look directly at the world and toward the acceptance of one's own mortality.

Hindsight itself, though, is a wicked mare that impresses upon its followers the idea that the past is impotent as a tool from which to learn. By crushing the scientific principles of financial forecasting, this opposing argument fails to itself be immune. The idea that financial planning is not 100-percent successful is based likewise on "educated guessing," ultimately poisoning such criticism's rationale.

Investment and planning for economic situations are a function of experience. The unpredictability of the future is through this method not rejected, but accepted and respected. Financial planning is never exact, but by sacrificing perfection for security, a sound financial plan works quite well to soften economically the fated blows to be received from the future.

The proof, so they say, is in the pudding. One cannot harvest what one has not sown, and this is so for a quality financial plan. Ignorance of how a plan's strength is interwoven with its input is an unfortunate error, yet this blindness comes not from the formulation but from the formulator.

As these financial fenceposts are staked about one's life commitments, a deep understanding of who one is and where one is going are undeniable ingredients.

Along with patience and commitment, one needs only to start early along this road toward financial independence.

A sound financial plan, taking into consideration these aforementioned properties, only can help a person in economically dealing with emergencies, retirement and life in general.

TODD PETERSEN / COLLEGIAN

Health care exploits patient rights

Americans live under the delusion that they have the best health care system in the world, a delusion that lingers until their first experience with the emergency room of a hospital. Only then, when confronted with a real medical situation, does the average American realize the glaring shortcomings of health care in the United States.

Whereas in most other First World countries the primary concern of the medical system would be to treat the incoming patient, under the American health-care system, the primary concern is to discover the type and level of health insurance the patient possesses. Patient health insurance determines what treatments they might receive, for how long, or even whether he or she shall receive treatment at all for a particular condition. The cost of the health care is then assessed—by increasing deductibles and decreasing coverage, the seriously ill patients might find themselves faced with a hospital bill more debilitating the original disease. Those patients who are among the 44 million Americans who cannot afford or will not be accepted by a health insurance plan must take their chances with Medicaid and be prepared to pay the full cost of medications.

The American philosophy of health care is one that considers human health to be a commodity and not a basic right. Like all commodities, health has, in this country, been allowed to be bought and sold on the common market. The result has been the monopolization of the American health industry by insurance companies with an overriding motivation to generate profit. Rather than the superior health care that a competition-driven marketplace has promised, we have seen a gradual erosion of the available medical procedures and diagnostic tests available under HMOs and a push by insurance companies for physicians to prescribe cheaper, less effective treatments for patients.

Instead of the choice of physicians, hospitals, and insurance plans touted by insurance company spokespeople, corporate monopolies in many states are effectively giving patients no or little choice in their physicians, treatments, or insurance coverage.

Much of the debate over health care has centered around new ways to restructure the system in order to allow all Americans access to privately managed health insurance or to allow employees more freedom to negotiate their insurance plans with the corporations that maintain them. The theory has been to level the playing field. The practice would be to reinforce the importance of private health insurance in the American medical system. All of these proposals consistently have relied upon the cooperation and participation of private insurance companies, the very entities that repeatedly have demonstrated an inability or unwillingness to place availability, service or quality of care above considerations of their profit margins. Why should we expect a corporation to transform itself into a charity, simply because the matter of business is the condition of human health?

In contrast to the United States, Canadians consider health care to be a basic right and enjoy a health insurance system that reflects this fundamental ideal. Canadian health care is equal to or better than that available in the United States, is equally accessible to all citizens regardless of economic status, and the cost of health insurance to each citizen is assessed based upon their ability to pay, not upon their age or current level of health. Because the Canadian insurance system lacks the burdens of investors, demanding dividends, corporate overhead, or bureaucracy, it is capable of providing a higher level of health care to each patient at a much lower cost than in the United States. Consider also that the primary source of medical insurance fraud in the United States is perpetrated by the insurance companies themselves, who abuse Medicare and Medicaid to siphon hundreds of millions of dollars of federal money into their coffers. In Canada, however, the main source of medical insurance fraud is Americans going north of the border to get into Canadian hospitals.

It is rare in life that a complex problem can be dealt with by a simple solution, and yet in the realm of health care there does exist a simple, cost-effective way of providing quality health care to all patients that has been demonstrated time and again to work and to work well. All that is required is the social will to place considerations of human health above the machinations of the marketplace and to remove once and for all medicine from the purview of the private insurance companies.

Something to consider, the next time you find yourself in a hospital waiting room.

K-State women's basketball loses chance at Big 12 championship

The K-State women's basketball team had its Big 12 Tournament championship hopes destroyed Wednesday at Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo.

K-State was defeated by Texas Tech, the tournament's No. 1 seed and the eighth-ranked team in the country, 74-55 in the second round of the tournament.

K-State coach Deb Patterson said she was disappointed with her team's performance.

"We're all extremely disappointed we weren't able to make our matchup more competitive," Patterson said. "Texas Tech dominated us in every facet of the game. Obviously, they are a great basketball team and made our efforts today fruitless."

Entering the game, the Cats focused their defensive attention on Angie Braziel, the Big 12 player of the year, but it was the play of guard Rene Hanebutt that was the difference in the game.

Hanebutt broke her own Big 12 Tournament three-point record by hitting seven from the arc. She finished the game with 26 points.

K-State center Angie Finkes said Hanebutt's play made it difficult for the Cats to defend Texas Tech.

"They have a great post game," Finkes said. "Angie Braziel is a great athlete. It was real difficult trying to defend inside when you knew someone was hitting outside. Hanebutt was doing that effectively."

The inside-outside combination of Hanebutt and Braziel started early in the game. After the game's first eight minutes, Hanebutt had scored 11 points.

K-State trailed throughout the first half and failed to cut the Red Raider lead missing some key opportunities. At the half, K-State shot 52 percent from the field and was led in scoring by Finkes, who had 10 points.

Texas Tech entered halftime shooting 50 percent from both field-goal range and from beyond the three-point line. At halftime, K-State trailed 38-30.

After committing 10 first-half turnovers, K-State opened the second half with more turnovers.

"It is tough to open up a half with turnovers when you are in a deficit," Patterson said.

The Cats would end the game with 24 turnovers.

Texas Tech opened up the second half where they left off as Hanebutt continued to stroke the three-point shot, while the Cats failed to get anything done offensively.

"Anytime we opened the door, they barreled through it," Patterson said.

K-State shot just 34 percent from the field in the second half, and the team was led in scoring by Finkes, who finished with 17.

Texas Tech had an early second half run that helped the Red Raiders build a double-digit lead. With 15:55 left in the game, the Red Raiders went on a 19-6 run. During the run, K-State experienced foul trouble, as forwards Nicky Ramage and Brandy Harris each had to go to the bench with four fouls.

Men's team to seek win against Aggies

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Do or die.
As the end of the 1998-99 basketball season approaches, the K-State men's basketball team has only two options going into the first round of the 1999 Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament.

K-State either can keep on winning and keep its NCAA hopes alive or lose and risk the chance of missing post-season play all together.

"No doubt about it, we have got to beat Texas A&M and advance in the Big 12 Tournament," assistant coach Mark Fox said. "You can't look ahead to the next game. There is no way around it. We have to stay focused on the game ahead."

The Wildcats face Texas A&M at 6 tonight in Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo. K-State is the seventh seed, with an 18-11 record on the season, while the Aggies post the 10th seed and a 12-14 record on the year.

K-State has won three of its last five games but dropped its last game of the regular season to Colorado 69-60 in Boulder, Colo., on Saturday. Texas A&M has lost four of its last five, including a disappointing loss in Lincoln, Neb., to Nebraska 87-68.

The Cats will look to strike revenge against the Aggies from a 79-74 loss in College Station, Texas, on Feb. 10. With the Aggies shooting 52 percent from the field and out-rebounding the Wildcats 31-28, Fox said the Wildcats' defensive problems resulted in the loss.

"We were very disappointed with our defensive effort in that game," he said. "The second time we play them, we will have to make adjustments on the defensive end."

The Aggies are led by junior guard Clifton Cook, who averages 15.6 points and 5.8 assists a game, and senior forward Shanne Jones, who averages 14.2 points and 6.1 rebounds a night.

GAME NOTES
K-State leads the all-time series with the Aggies 5-2, with a 2-0 advantage at a neutral site. The Wildcats and Aggies have never met in league tournament play. Rhodes' 117 career blocks puts him at No. 1 in K-State history, right ahead of Diesel's 116 blocks. In Saturday's 69-60 loss to Colorado, no Cat scored in double figures. It is the first time that has happened since a Jan. 4, 1997 loss to Kansas. Coach Tom Asbury has used nine different starting lineups this season. A K-State win would earn the Cats a quarterfinal match against Missouri on Friday.

two schools, Jones poured in 18 points and Cook scored 17 to lead the Aggies to victory.

Since the Cats' poor defensive effort against Texas A&M, the Wildcats have posted strong defensive efforts against Nebraska and Iowa State. The Wildcats kept the Huskers to a lowly 33 percent on senior night last Wednesday.

Senior forward Shawn Rhodes said the Wildcats hope to take the defensive momentum from those games into the Big 12 Tournament.

Rhodes leads Wildcats

Senior basketball player admired by coaches.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the past four years, K-State senior basketball player Shawn Rhodes has made his name a mainstay in the record books and in the memories of Wildcat fans everywhere.

Rhodes came to the K-State program from Wichita Northwest High School, where he led the school to two runner-ups and a fourth-place finish in the state 6A tournament. As a senior, he averaged 16.6 points and eight rebounds per game while leading the Wichita City League in three-point shooting percentage, with a mark of 47 percent.

Rhodes was an honorable-mention selection for the conference in both his sophomore and junior seasons before being named to the first team his senior year, while grabbing all-state honors as well.

In Rhodes' time as a Cat, he has had an immediate effect on the program K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said Rhodes' long-range shooting and his ability to get the rebounds, in addition to his outstanding leadership, has made him a great player.

"Shawn has been a very valuable part of this program the last few years in many ways," Fox said. "His outside shooting and his defensive presence to get rebounds and block shots has been great."

"He's a great leader on the floor and a great team captain."

Rhodes' mark in the record books isn't finished yet. Right now, he is at the top of the career blocks list with 117 but is feeling growing pressure from senior teammate Manny Dies, who has 116.

Fox said one of Rhodes' best qualities is his unselfishness as a team player.

"He isn't selfish," Fox said. "Sometimes he's too unselfish when he thinks 'Pass first, shoot second.' He's a great teammate. He'll do whatever it takes to win. If he has to sacrifice scoring totals, or guard someone he normally wouldn't want to guard, he will for the team's success."

Rhodes became K-State's leading blocker against non-conference opponent St. Louis earlier this season.

In addition to the blocked shots, Rhodes is the twelfth-highest K-State rebounder, with 576 career rebounds, and thirteenth-highest stealer, with 64.

The race is on to finish in K-State's top 20 in scoring, but entering the first-round Big 12 Conference Tournament game against Texas A&M, Rhodes is No. 21 in points scored, with 938 career points, while teammate Ayome May is No. 20, with 941.

K-State assistant coach Butch Hawking said the effort Rhodes has put forth has paid off.

"He has been an excellent student athlete here," Hawking said. "He is a very coachable player. He is well-liked by his teammates and leads by actions. He has raised his game to another level in the Big 12."

Few know what Rhodes will be doing after his senior season at K-State, but Fox said he thinks Rhodes has what it takes to play professional basketball.

"I don't know if he's an NBA guy, but he definitely has the ability to play somewhere," Fox said. "His ability to pass and shoot the ball is attractive to certain leagues out there. He can play there for sure."

The rich, the tall and the modest: a story of Jayhawk basketball and those who play it.

VIEWPOINT

VIETTI

As all of the basketball crazies know, March Madness is practically upon us, but even the casual fan is aware of that.

It certainly is going to be another wild, exciting tournament with upsets galore. Hopefully, there will be another Bryce Drew to keep us glued to the television sets.

As part of the Collegian's coverage of the NCAA Tournament, I have conducted an interview with several members of a probable tournament team that has had a disappointing season.

I am not allowed to mention the team they play for, but the team has some of the most annoying fans in college basketball who have an even more annoying chant performed after each victory that, unfortunately, most of this team's fans have no clue what the chant actually means. The town in which they play is located about 80 miles directly east of Manhattan, and the players sport blue home jerseys with a pathetic, wimpy looking bird on the side of their shorts.

As far as the players go, one is a senior who used to play point guard but has now switched to shooting guard. He was a McDonald's All-American at his high school in Missouri, but the closest he has come to those honors in college is eating a Big Mac. He stands at 6 feet, 5 inches, weighs 190 pounds and wears the number four. I will refer to him as "Mr. I-don't-care-that-I'm-not-even-close-to-being-as-good-as-Jacque-Vaughn-because-he-wasn't-very-good-either."

The next player is a junior or senior. Hell, not even the NCAA knows what he is. His family won the lottery while he played at a different school his freshman year. Except in that lottery, his family was the sole entry and the money came directly from his school. He is 6-feet 8-inches tall, weighs 235 pounds and wears the number three. I will refer to him as "Mr. So-what-if-my-family-took-money-for-me-to-play-basketball-I'll-never-have-that-chance-again."

The last player was also a McDonald's All-American in high school, but only because he is 7 feet tall. He often has been compared to a former player at his school who was drafted by the Denver Nuggets this past year, but that player had skills, this one doesn't. In addition to being 7-feet tall, he weighs 235 pounds and wears the number 44. I will refer to him as "Mr. I'm tall and that's all."

Let the interview begin:

Me: Thanks, fellas, for allowing me to do this interview, I know you're probably trying to get ready for postseason play.

Mr. I: Hell, we aren't even sure if we'll make the big dance this year.

Mr. I: Yeah, coach says that if I don't go through my second phase of puberty soon and start acting like a man inside, we'll lose our first game in the Big 12 Tournament.

Mr. So: I love money.

Me: Well, why do you think you guys have had a bad season?

Mr. I: I think because coach assumed that because I'm tall, I would be able to do stuff other than just stand around and block shots.

Mr. I: No, I think it's because some shmoe made me an All-American in high school and thought I could make shots other than the ones where I'm left wide open.

Mr. So: Naw, that's not it either. I need to be paid to play, that's the problem.

Me: You guys lost to Iowa State on Sunday and to Texas Tech earlier in the year — how does that feel to lose to bad teams like those?

Mr. I: It hurts because in those games, the tallest guy guarding me was only 6-8.

Me: It's okay, there are plenty of 7-foot tall players who aren't that good.

Mr. I: Yeah, but how many were All-Americans in high school?

Me: Well, you got me there.

Mr. So: It's because the new car my moms got at the school I used to play for got wrecked and now she doesn't have another one. I'll play up to par when my moms gets a car ... I should rap for money.

Me: Perhaps, but back to basketball. How does it feel to know that each of you was predicted to play in the NBA coming out of high school and now it looks like none of you will actually do it, except for the 7-foot waste of space.

Mr. I: (sobbing) Why can't I learn to make shots other than putbacks and dunks?

Mr. I: I don't really care any more, I'm the only smart one here, and I knew I would never play in the pros — I wish I could shoot like Jacque Vaughn, that's how he made it there.

Mr. So: I don't care either, cause I'm going to transfer to a different school that's gonna buy my moms a house. After I get in trouble there, I'm gonna transfer again. Hell, I'm gonna stay in college forever so I can makes some cash — I'll go NAIA if I gots to.

Me: Thank you very much gentleman for your time, and good luck in the tournament.

Mr. So: Do we get parts of the concession money?

Mr. I: (excited) I'll call Ralph Sampson, he'll know how to help me!

Mr. I: Good lord, I can't wait to graduate.

Kelli Berry and Benjamin Andrews portray Julie and Steve in the KSU Opera Theatre's production of "Show Boat." The musical opened Tuesday evening and runs until tonight.

bringing home

'SHOW BOAT'

hose who love musicals will find that "Show Boat" meets their highest expectations.

One of the most outstanding performances of the production, which is put on by KSU Opera Theatre and ends tonight, was by guest actor Andre Solomon-Glover, who portrayed Joe a black laborer. Solomon-Glover sang the famous song from the musical, "Ol' Man River."

His incredible baritone voice, blended with the harmonies of the United Black Voices, made the popular song about hard labor unforgettable for the audience.

Another song the audience continued to hum after the show was "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man," first sung by Kelli Berry, who portrayed Julie, and Lezlynn Almond, senior in marketing and international business, who portrayed Queenie. Berry's clear voice and Almond's excellent voice and sassy attitude made the song fun and memorable.

The reprise of "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man" was sung by Sarah Kuhns, junior in applied music, who portrayed Magnolia. Kuhns' smooth, strong voice and innocent appearance enhanced her performance.

Another great vocal performance was by Timothy Bonnell, senior in applied music, who portrayed Ravenal. Bonnell's solos were superb as was his duet with Kuhns.

The vocal performances weren't the only highlight of "Show Boat." The characters also shone in their roles.

Curtis D. Knecht, graduate student in music, played the role of Cap'n Andy convincingly. He seemed to be a loud, cocky and self-absorbed man preoccupied with his show. In reality, he lived in fear of his wife, Parthy, played by Melissa Ilione Jordan, graduate student in speech. She wonderfully portrayed the nasty, overprotective wife who everyone loves to hate.

Other characters were a pair of Vaudeville comics, Frank and Ellie, played by Erik Hogan, senior in applied music, and Jill E. Volland, junior in applied music. They worked well as a pair, making the audience laugh with their onstage antics.

The costumes looked extremely authentic. From the pinstripes and the coattails to the long ruffly dresses and the big bouncy curls, they made the musical appear to be set convincingly at the turn of the century.

The upper class characters in the musical had the bright and bold colored costumes, while the black workers had the black and white colors that added a sharp contrast.

There could have been more of a difference between each actor's costume. The costumes looked too similar and made it hard to realize that the same actor was playing two different characters and not the same character.

The stage had a simple setup. A few platforms and props had to be moved throughout the performance. The set worked well for all of the scenes that were in different places at different times.

The orchestra, for the most part, did a wonderful job in accompanying the actors in "Show Boat." There were a few parts where the orchestra drowned out the actors and made the lines hard to hear. This only happened a couple of times during the speaking parts though, and never happened during the singing parts.

The aging of the characters, although, was a little inaccurate. "Show Boat" is supposed to take place over a time span of 50 years, but the actors never showed any signs of aging. I thought it would have been more effective to age the characters as necessary, either with gray hair or wrinkles.

Overall, "Show Boat" was an outstanding performance showcasing a lot of talent, making it a worthwhile and enjoyable musical.

Local bands aim to perform for those under 21

By GIGI MCCALL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Local bands Kne Deep and Ruskabank have joined together to form a "Supporters of Local Live Music" group in an effort to find a place to perform concerts for those under the age of 21.

The establishment of this group stemmed from a demand for concerts aimed at those in the Manhattan community who are under the age of 21, said Jay Machiela, senior in hotel and restaurant management and public relations and member of Kne Deep.

"There is no place for kids to see live music here in town on a regular basis," Machiela said. "There is no place where they can just let loose and hear live bands."

Dave Studnicka, junior in geography and member of Ruskabank, said he believed making bands accessible to youth would be beneficial to the community.

"It would be great if parents had a place where their kids could go out at night, a place with supervision, free of alcohol and drugs," Studnicka said.

Dave Spiker, senior in music and member of Ruskabank, said he hopes the public will support their action.

"We are prepared to do shows," Spiker said. "We just need a place where the younger audience can hear us."

Band members said they have approached many places in Manhattan about the possibility of performing in their establishment, including the Houston Street Ballroom and the Veterans of Foreign Wars Building. There has been little success.

"The VFW basically turned us down flat," Machiela said, "and the Houston Street Ballroom strongly discouraged us."

Michelle Davidson, manager of the Houston Street Center, said that while she would like a full schedule for the ballroom, criteria for performing there has been developed.

"We would like to say 'yes' to everyone," she said. "However, experience has taught us the cost of clean-up and repair is extensive following some types of events."

Davidson said that when requests are made to rent the Houston Street Ballroom, a series of questions are asked to help determine whether the customer needs are compatible with the ballroom facility.

"It is our goal at the Houston Street Ballroom to provide an attractive, comfortable meeting, banquet and reception space," Davidson said. "We contract for events that are consistent with this goal."

Neil Dalley, quartermaster and facility manager for the VFW, said a large concern of his was the age of the targeted audience.

"Young people are known to be a high-risk liability," Dalley said. "Exposing yourself to unnecessary liability is a risky thing."

Studnicka said, however, that Ruskabank has performed on many occasions for the Manhattan Arts Center. While they still perform there, Studnicka said they need a place where they can perform more often.

Mary Spiro Levin, secretary for the arts center, said that when Ruskabank has performed at the arts center, she believed the members have been responsible.

"There has never been any incident where we had any question Ruskabank might be a risk," she said. "They are a very responsible group. They really go above and beyond what you would expect."

"They have always treated our facility with the highest respect, and I think they would do the same anywhere else."

LEWINSKY

"Understandably, Starr's tactics have been a matter for grave public concern," according to Lewinsky's book. "The whole exchange about immunity was a waste of time except insofar as it exposed the dubious methods employed by Starr's investigators."

Her book spared no words for Starr's prosecutors, deriding one as a "revolting specimen of humanity" and another as "pit-bull terrier."

Deputy Independent Counsel Jackie Bennett said Wednesday his office had not yet seen the book.

But in the document sent to Congress two months ago, Starr disputed claims his office had mistreated Lewinsky, saying that while she was "understandably upset and distraught" by her first encounter with prosecutors, it was due to the "gravity of the situation."

Lewinsky also discloses in the book that she and her mother briefly considered "fleeing across the border to Canada" to escape Starr's investigation "but that idea was discarded as soon as it was mentioned, because they believed that the FBI would have every airport and border post staked out."

Lewinsky also offered her opinion of the president.

"Now I see him as a selfish man who lies all the time. That makes me very angry and resentful," she said in the book.

In a two-hour interview with Walters, Lewinsky questioned the sincerity of the president's apology for the entire episode, saying "I think he's sorry he got caught."

"I felt dirty and I felt used and I was disappointed," Lewinsky said.

She also acknowledged the falsity of her first affidavit. "I think I knew I was lying but ... I had no idea what all the different elements of perjury were at the time," she said.

In her book, Lewinsky recounted her feelings the day Starr's impeachment report came out on Capitol Hill.

"I really felt raped and physically ill with myself. ... I just felt that the world looked at me as a whore," she said.

"I was just a pawn used to get the president," she added.

As for the stained dress that became evidence in the case against Clinton, Lewinsky insisted that she kept it not as a trophy or evidence, but rather to save money on dry cleaning. She said the dress was a joke among her friends.

"We even laughed about it," Lewinsky told Walters. "With one I even joked, gee, maybe he'll pay for the dry cleaning." She said now, however, she would burn the dress if it was ever returned.

In both, Lewinsky volunteered detail about intensely personal matters.

She acknowledged she had an abortion after becoming pregnant during a three-month affair with a fellow Pentagon worker.

The abortion occurred in the latter part of 1996, while she was still seeing Clinton in secret meetings at the White House.

She also detailed another affair she had with a married man in Oregon while still in college, disclosing that when the romance was ending she had a "fling" with his younger brother to spite him.

gets tougher and tougher to sustain inside that one-on-one defense."

As the clock wound down the deficit got greater, and the Cats' Big 12 season came to a close. Patterson said she looks for next season to be a season in which the Cats can continue to build and get better.

"I hope we continue to build and improve," Patterson said. "I would be excited if I was a player on this team."

into the tournament," he said.

Last season, K-State dropped Colorado 75-61 in the first round but suffered a setback to eventual tournament champion and intrastate rival Kansas 68-61.

The Wildcats are 1-2 overall in the Big 12 Tournament. They lost in the inaugural tournament 73-57 to Texas Tech in the opening round.

Fox said last year's results do not play a factor in this year's tournament. "Last year has nothing to do with this year," he said.

"It makes no difference. You have to evaluate past games in order to adjust, but you have to take care of the task at hand."

Head coach Tom Asbury is 15-5 in post-season conference tournaments but is just 2-4 at K-State.

K-State is 21-20 overall in the Big 8 and Big 12 tournaments and last won a conference tournament in 1980 when the Wildcats defeated Kansas 79-58 in the final round.

K-State's best finish since was a second-place result in 1988 to Oklahoma.

As for this year's tournament, Fox said anybody could end up holding the Big 12 Tournament crown.

"The Big 12 Tournament is anybody's tournament," he said. "Our league is very balanced. Eight or nine teams could win or be very competitive."

Senior Chris Griffin said the team that can be consistent throughout the tournament will win.

"The team with the most momentum will most likely go on and win the whole tournament," he said.

FALL BREAK

The college begins classes two days earlier than the rest of the university. The two extra days are taken off in mid-October for fall break, Elmore said.

"It works well," he said. "Students look forward to it."

Elmore said the two days off give students and faculty a much-needed break. He said it's a long time between holidays in the fall, and the students have very heavy class loads.

Although faculty members do not get the time off, they get a break from classes to catch up on other work, he said.

Elmore said the calendar schedule weeks ago.

Conant said the House proposed that they use some of the money for special projects on individual universities.

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president at K-State, said President Jon Wefald spoke to the Senate about faculty salary increases about two weeks ago.

"We are pleased that the Senate recognized that we have a great need," Peterson said. "It is a great step in the right direction and we will take it and utilize it to the best of our abilities."

Peterson said the Senate and the House will have a conference early in April to decide on the exact amount of money.

"We are hoping that we can keep the Senate's money," Peterson said. "I think the chances are good we will have the increase. I'm keeping my fingers crossed."

Three other state schools received grants from the Kansas Health Foundation. The University of Kansas received the same amount as K-State. Emporia State University and Fort Hays State University both received nearly $244,000. All of the grants given will last five years, allowing K-State to spend about $90,000 a year.

"This is about students being socially and academically responsible," Ark said. "We want our students to be safer, healthier and able to achieve their goals."

Mann, regents discuss library tuition increase

By LAUREN POSLADEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Student Body President Tracey Mann met with members of the Kansas Board of Regents on Thursday to discuss a tuition increase for Hale Library funding.

Mann said they talked about the Student Senate's support of the proposal that could increase tuition $1 per credit hour for library enhancement. A cap would be set at 12 hours, making the maximum increase in tuition $12 per student, he said.

If the tuition increase is approved by the regents and the Legislature, an additional amount of nearly $600,000 per year would go toward K-State libraries.

Mann said the $12 increase would be a permanent part of tuition, but it would not be raised from year to year.

"This is a one-time deal," Mann said. "Every year students will pay $1 per credit hour to the library fund, but they will never be asked to pay two dollars."

The tuition increase proposal came after the Privilege Fee Committee rejected a proposal to increase privilege fees for library funding.

Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said the tuition increase is a good plan to help solve the problem of an inadequate library system.

"The library needs these funds to supply books and electronic resources for student use," Hobrock said. "This student initiative is one of a five-part plan to increase the capacity of our libraries."

In addition to student participation through the tuition increase, funding will come from the KSU Foundation, library endowments, sponsored research overhead and legislative appropriations.

Hobrock said money from the increase would account for less than one sixth of the library enhancement budget.

"We are working on getting $3.5 million more per year, which is double our current budget," he said. "When that happens, student money will ultimately be less than one-sixth of the new library funds."

The new money will provide books, electrical databases and information on demand for students, Hobrock said.

"With the additional resources available, students will have a greater expectation to find more of what they need at the library," he said. "Electronic resources, which are indexes and full-text information sources available by computers, allow 100 students to read the same periodical at the same time."

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said the proposal will be reviewed by the regents Budget Tuition Committee this spring before going on to the full board in June.

"The committee will probably make a decision by mid-May, and then send the proposal on to the full board later that month," Rawson said. "The final action will probably be in June."

After the proposal goes through the board, it must be approved by the Kansas Legislature.

Both Mann and Rawson said they thought the bill would pass in the legislature if it gained approval from the board.

"It doesn't require any additional state funds, so it should be approved," Rawson said.

If passed, the increase would go into effect in fall 2000, Mann said.

"It's unfortunate it can't start now, but we just have to wait one more year," Mann said. "It will be worth it to see improvements made that have been needed for years now."

In the meantime, Rawson said they will work on finding more immediate funding for the library.

"The library needs significant funds now," Rawson said. "We will try to put together resources to fill the one-year gap."

If the proposal is passed, student-generated funding for the library will no longer be an issue, Mann said.

"If the committee decides to do this, library funding from a student perspective should be a done deal," Mann said. "Students will already be giving their share."

Even though the money is not being allocated through privilege fees, students still will have influence over the library tuition funding. A student advisory committee probably will monitor the use of the tuition increase to make sure it gives the maximum benefit to students, Mann said.

Candidates could influence transit

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A few of today's Student Governing Association candidates might play a crucial role in deciding where — or even if — students will be parking in K-State's future.

A joint transportation study is entering its final phase this spring, and many officials have said those recommendations could pave the way for a public transportation system in Manhattan, possibly in cooperation with the university.

For the past year, the city has had a contract with TranSystems Corp., a Kansas City, Mo., consulting firm, to complete a comprehensive transportation study that includes the option of a public transportation system. In addition, K-State has a subcontract with TranSystems for a similar study of the campus.

Student Body President Tracey Mann said members of next fall's student government could be important players in the proposals.

"I think they can have a huge influence, if they choose to," Mann said.

The final TranSystems report is still in the works, and Mann said his administration and Student Senate did not put a special committee on the subject. Next fall, however, the report will be done, and he said SGA officials should build a rapport with the city and its constituents.

"What candidates need to be doing is getting some sort of mechanism for feedback from students," he said.

Surveys are an option, but talking to groups and individuals will tell candidates what the students are willing to support, Mann said.

This is not a new situation. K-State already has had five parking or transportation studies since 1978. The most recent, in 1993, gave a multilevel parking

Tri-Sigas to close chapter due to lack of funds, members

By JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the K-State chapter of Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority voted Wednesday to return their charter to the national Tri-Sigma office, a move that would bring an end to the chapter.

Stacy Kissling, charter member of Tri-Sigma, said several factors contributed to the decision, but the main one was the chapter's traditionally small number of new members and the resulting lack of funds generated.

"A sorority works as a business operation," Kissling said. "If that business is not going to be successful number-wise or financial-wise, you've got to close the business."

"It's not just one thing," Kissling said. "It's just little things that have added up. But it has nothing to do with internal sorority problems, because we don't have any of those."

Although past rush numbers contributed to the decision, Kissling and fellow charter member Desiree Lamberson said other factors also prompted the action.

"Overall, greek image right now is not the best," Lamberson said. "That, of course, hurts rush numbers."

"We could see that, ultimately, this was the right decision."

Chapter president Kelli Benjamin, junior in human resource management, said members of the house reached their decision after a five-hour discussion on the issue.

"I felt that it was going to happen sometime," Benjamin said. "We wanted to do this with dignity, while we still feel positively towards the house."

Benjamin said she brought the issue up at the meeting after she was asked to do so by several alumnae members of the house.

"They thought it was time to make a decision," she said. "They brought it to our attention, because they didn't want to see it go downhill. They just didn't want us to have to experience that."

"We decided that no matter what we did, it wasn't going to work," Benjamin said.

The Tri-Sigma chapter has only existed since August 1996. The previous chapter had its charter suspended in May, 1996, to try to recover from similar problems, Lamberson said.

"People knew we were a new chapter, but a lot of people still associated us with the old one," Lamberson said. "We fought an uphill battle the whole way, and we just realized it was time to give in."

"It was just too soon," Lamberson said, although the chapter had only survived for three years since it was re-created, none of the members felt remorse for their attempt to make it work.

"I don't think anyone in the house regrets starting the house," Lamberson said. "We don't regret it at all. We love the house so much that we were willing to make this decision."

She said this decision was in the best interest of the chapter because it was inevitable. The only real question,

Dole aims for peace in Kosovo

By GEORGE GEDDA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — As he flew toward the Balkans on Thursday, the Yugoslav government left former Sen. Bob Dole in the air about whether he will be allowed to enter Kosovo today for talks with Kosovo Albanians.

A State Department request for a visa for Dole was submitted days ago but Yugoslavia had not approved it by the time Dole took off from Andrews Air Force Base.

"We certainly hope that (Yugoslav President Slobodan) Milosevic and the Serbs don't try to use this visa issue as an excuse to derail a mission of peace," Dole's spokesman Doug McKinnon said.

If Dole can't get into Kosovo, he hopes to arrange meetings in neighboring Macedonia, McKinnon said. Dole was planning to land in Macedonia, then cross the border into Kosovo, assuming he gets a visa.

The former Republican presidential candidate, who is making the trip at the request of President Clinton, has been critical of Milosevic before. Last June, Dole said NATO should conduct air strikes against military installations in Serbia unless Milosevic halted attacks in Kosovo and agreed to peace talks.

Dole hopes to persuade the Kosovar Albanians to endorse a peace plan fashioned by six nations. The Clinton administration is optimistic that an agreement will be obtained, but it is less certain about the intentions of Milosevic.

In a statement late Wednesday, Dole, former Republican presidential candidate who lost to Clinton in 1996, said the peace plan is not perfect but provides the best chance to put the people of Kosovo on a course of self-rule and liberty.

Of particular importance, Dole said, is the provision calling for implementation of the agreement by NATO troops with U.S. participation. "With NATO troops for protection," he said, "the people of Kosovo can determine their own agenda and future."

Dole said Milosevic's "aggressive policies continue to threaten the entire region. The United States and our NATO allies must act. We cannot afford to allow this destabilizing situation to continue to spill over into neighboring countries or tear our NATO allies apart."

Pentagon spokesman Kenneth Bacon expressed concern that large numbers of Yugoslav army tanks, armored personnel carriers and artillery pieces deployed near the Kosovo border may be used to oppose the entry of NATO forces.

Bacon said such troops would not be deployed unless there is a peace agreement.

Alternatively, he said the weaponry could be used for attacks against the Kosovar Albanian rebel army.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, in Jakarta for meetings with Indonesian officials, said she had talked to Dole on Thursday morning.

"He's someone who has a very good relationship with the Kosovar Albanians, and he has taken a great personal interest in this subject," she said. "I'm very pleased that he's able to undertake this mission."

Candidates form UAB group

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As part of their presidential campaign, Jason Heinrich and Gabe Eckert registered a group of their student supporters with University Activities Board.

Eckert, vice presidential candidate, said he and Heinrich decided to register the group, Students for Heinrich and Eckert, in order to get more students and supporters excited about the campaign. But the group also gives Heinrich and Eckert the opportunity to request funds from Student Governing Association and access to other campus resources.

"We were looking for a way to formally organize students with our campaign," Eckert said. "This is a way to join together and become excited in the election process."

In addition to requesting money from student privilege fees to fund events, UAB groups can conduct meetings and functions on campus free of charge, use computers in the Office of Student Activities and Services and receive mail in OSAS.

Elections Chair Joe Ashley said the main advantage for Heinrich and Eckert is the ability to organize meetings in the K-State Student Union. Unless a group is registered with UAB, it cannot.

Allocations Committee member Kim Peschka said registering a campaign group creates a conflict of interest.

"If they wanted to, they could request funding, which comes from student fee money," Peschka said. "I doubt they would do this, and it would never pass through our committee, but it still looks bad and is just a bad idea in general."

Allocations Chair Carlton Getz said the only advantage to Heinrich and Eckert is the convenience. He said it was the same as any other group getting together with its adviser and planning to meet in Seaton or Eisenhower halls.

"I look at it as an inventive way of doing things," Getz said. "Every organization that registers with UAB has to pay a $5 fee, so that will be an expense they will incur, but it is up to the organization themselves if they want to register."

Eckert said that in the past, the number of student coalitions for a candidate has dropped, and this was their way of getting students to join with a campaign.

"We were looking for a way to form a group that was responsible and

Two arrested in Alabama in brutal murder of gay man

SYLACAUGA, Ala. — Two men who claimed to be angry over a sexual advance by a gay acquaintance plotted his murder for two weeks, then beat him to death with an ax handle and burned the body on a pyre of old tires, police said Thursday.

Steven Eric Mullins, 25, and Charles Monroe Butler Jr., 21, were arrested earlier this week and charged with murder in the slaying of Billy Jack Gaither, 39. They were each held on $500,000 bail. The charges brought by police carry a maximum of life in prison, but a grand jury could indict the men on charges punishable by death.

Mullins and Butler, who apparently knew Gaither from going to the same bars around town, claimed that Gaither made a pass at them, sheriff's Deputy Al Bradley said. The two then decided on a murder plan, the deputy said.

Mullins and Gaither went to pick up Butler at a nightclub, where he was participating in a pool tournament, Bradley said. The three men went to a secluded boat ramp, where Gaither was beaten and thrown in the trunk of his own car, then was taken to the trash-strewn banks of Peckerwood Creek, the deputy said.

Bradley said two tires were set on fire with kerosene atop a concrete platform overlooking the slow-moving, murky water.

"They took him out of the trunk, took an ax handle and beat him to death. Then they put the body on the fire," he said.

Gaither's burned-out car was found the next day on a country road.

Retired justice Blackmun dies following hip surgery

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Retired Supreme Court Justice Harry A. Blackmun, who wrote the 1973 decision that legalized abortion nationwide and ignited a still-raging moral and political debate, died Thursday at 90.

He had retired in 1994 after serving 24 years on the nation's highest court.

Blackmun died at a hospital in suburban Arlington, Va., from complications following hip-replacement surgery performed nine days earlier. He had fallen and broken his hip at home a day before the operation.

President Clinton, who had come to know Blackmun well, praised him as someone with "passion for the welfare of the American people, for defending our liberties and our institutions, for moving us forward together."

He said Blackmun served "with compassion, distinction and honor." Appointed in 1970 by President Nixon, Blackmun was considered a staunch conservative in his early days on the court. But by the time he retired, he was considered its most liberal justice.

Justice Antonin Scalia, who opposed Blackmun's views on abortion and many other subjects, called him "a good man and a good justice deserving of the respect of all Americans."

Noriega's prison sentence reduced for his aid to U.S.

MIAMI — A federal judge reduced Manuel Noriega's prison sentence from 40 years to 30 on Thursday, meaning the former Panamanian dictator could be eligible for release by 2007.

Noriega, 62, won the reduction from U.S. District Judge William M. Hoeveler after arguing that he deserves credit for helping the United States pursue its interests in Latin America while he was in power.

Noriega was captured after the United States invaded Panama in 1989 and was sent to prison for money laundering and drug trafficking. He has spent nearly nine years by himself in a two-cell suite at a federal prison near Miami since Hoeveler granted him special status as a prisoner of war.

Hoeveler said he shortened Noriega's sentence after considering the nature of his confinement and the "disparity between the defendant's sentence and the sentences served by his co-conspirators" — some of whom are out of prison. "What the defendant may have done to the citizens of Panama or to his political opponents are not factors that I can properly consider," Hoeveler said.

States fighting for exclusive rights to tobacco awards

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The federal government would get none of the $246 billion promised by tobacco companies to states to settle health-related lawsuits under a bill approved Thursday by a key Senate committee.

"This is money the states won on their own, with no help from the federal government," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, a sponsor. "This will settle the issue once and for all."

The Clinton administration has asserted that the federal government deserves a slice of the money paid by tobacco companies. The administration points out that under Medicaid law, states must share proceeds of any lawsuits involving the program because half its costs are borne by the federal government. Many of the states' lawsuits relied on the costs of tobacco-related illnesses to the Medicaid program in seeking money from the tobacco companies.

All 50 governors and hundreds of state officials have been battling to keep the money — they say Washington played no part in the drawn-out legal fight — and spend it as they see fit. The tobacco companies agreed to pay $40 billion over 25 years to settle four state lawsuits and another $206 billion in a broader deal with the other 46 states.

Hutchison's measure would bar the Clinton administration from using Medicaid law to recoup the money. Supporters said it was critical to move the measure swiftly because state legislatures nationwide are making decisions on how to spend their shares.

"Now is the time," Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., said. "The states are wondering what to do."

Ugandans pursue rebels accused of tourist attack

KAMPALA, Uganda — Hundreds of Ugandan army troops moved into neighboring Congo on Thursday, struggling through dense tropical rain forests to search for the Rwandan rebels who slaughtered eight foreign tourists, including two Americans.

Police reinforced troops on the Uganda border, trying to close in on the Congo-based rebels who slaughtered the tourists with machetes and axes in southwestern Uganda's Impenetrable Forest. The tourists were there to view rare mountain gorillas.

The search, which involved at least 600 Ugandan soldiers and an unknown number of Rwandan troops, came as Uganda's private Central Broadcasting Service said the rebels warned in leaflets they would launch further attacks. The report did not say whether the threat was aimed specifically at foreigners.

An FBI team, meanwhile, was in Kampala, the capital, investigating the deaths of the two Americans. Four Britons and two New Zealanders were also killed. Six other tourists survived.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

A graphic highlighting student body presidential candidates' stance on fall break was erroneously deleted from a story in Thursday's Collegian.

As part of continuing coverage of Student Governing Association elections, candidates were asked about SafeRide, city transportation and fall break. Their answers have been printed this week as part of stories explaining those issues.

The Collegian has reprinted the graphic today for voters' convenience and regrets the error.

If you see something that should be corrected, call News Editor Joe Hurla at 532-6556 or e-mail collegn@ksu.edu.

Candidates want campus beautification, awareness about issues

By ANNETTE SWEET
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Presidential and vice presidential running mates Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea said that although their campaign might seem far-fetched, they are serious about it.

The two main focuses of their campaign platform are overall campus beautification and making Student Senate a more direct democracy rather than a representative structure. Wooten, junior in finance, and Shea, junior in secondary education, said.

"The main goal is to get students involved," Shea said.

The two said there is no difference between a student and themselves because they are not coming in with an insider's view, but an outsider's view.

Wooten and Shea said they are interested in issues that affect the student body and want to incorporate their ideas into next year's government. Decisions would be warranted by talking with the students and seeing how they feel and what they think.

"We don't want to be the only ones making the decisions," Shea said. "We want the opportunity to find out what students want."

Before Wooten approached Shea about being his running mate, Shea said he never had thought about running, but that it sounded like a good idea.

"I have complained about stuff on campus," Shea said. "And now instead of just complaining, I am going to get out and really do some things."

Wooten said putting in a little flash and flare into a campaign will get people to notice them. Even if no one decides to vote for them, they will have left an impression and been involved.

Shea said he was interested in shaking things up and getting things done. He said he wanted to try to get issues addressed and done their way, not be controlled by the already existing government.

Rick Wooten, left, junior in finance, and Aaron Shea, junior in secondary education, said the two main focuses of their campaign are overall campus beautification and making Student Senate a more direct democracy, rather than a representative structure.

Wooten and Shea use three words to sum up their campaign: leadership, intelligence and fun.

Each is reflected in how they want to make K-State better, starting with overall campus beautification.

"We want to make the campus nicer," Shea said. "Maybe have a pond where all that grass is by Anderson Hall and geese could land, have benches to sit around, and construct fountains."

He said that if K-State could make the land nicer, then maybe it could attract more students.

Wooten stresses beautification of the campus as the main issue of their campaign.

"We would like to see a more visually pleasing campus, which will improve our overall image and boost student morale."

Wooten and Shea said they were interested in what the students have to say about issues concerning how money is spent on the university.

However, on the issue of SafeRide, their opinions vary. Shea said instead of instituting the cab-style mode of transportation, the idea of having a designated driver would be better, and it also would teach responsibility.

"The money saved from this program could then be used to make the campus better," Shea said.

Wooten said he has read both sides of the issue. He said some people feel they shouldn't have to pay to take a person who has had too much to drink home because not everyone goes to the bar.

"However, along those same lines, not everyone gets sick or goes to Rec," Wooten said. "But these are important parts of our university, and the SafeRide would benefit the student population."

Wooten and Shea are on the same platform for the library student privilege fee.

"The library fee is not as important as some of the other issues," Wooten said. "For my major it isn't an essential part of my education, but for others it is. So we need to make available the resources that people need, which may mean raising the student privilege fee."

He said a person can't put these things on a per-use basis.

"Somebody might just want to pay for the things they use," Wooten said. "But this is a university. It is basically a taxation on a small town. You can't just pay for the roads you want to drive on or the traffic lights you want to stop at. It is all or nothing."

Wooten said he would like to have a student referendum vote for raising the fees for issues such as the stadium expansion.

"In this election, if anything, we would like to increase the student population voting and increase the awareness among people who do not usually vote or participate," Wooten said. "We want to make people aware of the campaign process."

Lafene offers STD screening, treatments

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A guy and girl meet, they fall in love and decide to take their relationship a step further.

However, it might never enter their minds that one or the other has had sexual relationships previously. For them, the thought of a sexually transmitted disease doesn't become an issue.

STDs are diseases or infections a person can get from sexual contact or intercourse. These include diseases such as genital warts and herpes, chlamydia, gonorrhea and HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

Dr. Wendy Blank, director of the Women's Clinic at Lafene Health Center, said the most common STDs that will affect college students are genital warts and herpes. There are precautions that students can take to avoid getting more serious diseases, she said.

"The best way to prevent getting STDs is by abstaining," Blank said. "Knowing your partner and both getting checked for chlamydia, gonorrhea and HIV is also another good precaution."

In 1998, Lafene recorded 1,400 gonorrhea and chlamydia tests. Although numbers are down during the summer because of the smaller number of students, about 100 or more tests are performed each month.

Reita Currie, health educator at Lafene, said abstinence is the only 100-percent precaution against being infected by an STD. However, she said using condoms and knowing the other person are ways of decreasing the chances of being infected with a virus.

"Trying to limit the number of sexual partners and being faithful to each other is very important," Currie said. "If these diseases go unchecked, the symptoms might go away, but they will come back in another form, usually worse."

STDs affect millions of Americans every year. Blank said many STDs have few or no symptoms.

"I hear it every day from students who feel fine and have no symptoms, so they assume they do not have an STD," Blank said. "It is very important to be screened, because there can be serious complications for both men and women."

Letting STDs go unchecked can lead to sterility in men and women, increased risks of cervical cancer for women, birth defects in children and even death.

According to a report by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment in 1997, the highest-reported STD in Riley County was chlamydia, at 170 cases. In the same year, there were fewer than five cases of AIDS reported and 41 cases of gonorrhea.

Currie said there are treatments for many of the bacterial and viral infections. However, only the bacterial diseases are treatable. She said although a disease is cured once, that doesn't mean it won't come back.

Buses would combat parking, congestion

A citywide transportation program would help address the problem that students talk about most: parking.

Until the university finds a way to create more parking spaces, the best way to combat the parking situation is to decrease the number of cars on campus. A public-transit system in Manhattan would do this and much more.

The idea of Manhattan being a town where everything you need is within walking distance is a misconception. Students without cars know that shopping centers such as Aggieville only can give you so much. So, there needs to be some way to help students — and all Manhattan residents — who cannot provide their own transportation.

Creating a bus system would allow students to live farther off campus. Although no one wants buses running through campus all day, having K-State as a drop-off point makes the entire city of Manhattan habitable for students. That, in turn, allows students to find less-expensive housing farther from campus without needing to buy a parking pass, or worse, a car.

That's an important selling point for prospective students. As Manhattan grows, K-State becomes less attractive to students without a mode of transportation. Offering them public transportation alleviates any worry of not being able to get around.

Game days provide a prime example of how beneficial this would be. Students and visitors would not have to worry about how to get to the game or where to park. With a transit system, Manhattan becomes more of a visitors' center, and K-State can only prosper.

Unfortunately, such a system would take time to get off the ground. Next year's Student Governing Association officials will need to take strong action to get anything started. But this sort of proposal is so much easier to sell than, say, SafeRide. Whereas SafeRide's purpose would be to cart students home after dark, a public-transit system could cart students around all day. It also would free up parking spaces and alleviate congestion throughout campus.

Although it wouldn't solve all of the students' quibbles with Parking Services, it sure would make getting to campus easier.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

It looks like Danedri Thompson is just looking for a little attention. She should also just try walking on the sidewalk.

I want to know who's paying for all of these stupid green K-State signs that are popping up everywhere. They're pretty pointless, because they're always within a block of campus. It's like, "Hey buddy, if you're looking for K-State, that's it across the street."

I think rather than getting Del Harris to coach the K-State basketball team, we should see if we could get him to play on the basketball team, because they need him.

I'd like to thank the people who brought us the Rolling Stones Covers Tour for giving us something else to look at rather than the sidewalk chalk.

Everyone has the choice to be Greek or independent. Whatever you think about the other group, please show civil decency by respecting their choice, even though you don't agree. Let's act like adults and stop the name-calling.

Lack of planning and management on the part of Hale Library is not a good reason to increase our student fee by a dollar.

The administration seems to think we don't like Coach Asbury only because of his losing conference season this year. No, folks, we're not fickle. Coach Patterson has the same conference wins this year as Asbury, but no one wants her out. That's because she's a caring coach that doesn't make excuses for her team.

It's no big mystery why parking at K-State has been such a problem for students for the past 10 years. Look at the reserved parking situation. All the people in Anderson Hall, the deans, the department heads who have reserved parking spaces, believe there is no parking problem at K-State, so nothing is ever done about it.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

Riding Out the STORM

Return to past only leads to destruction

I reread Edgar Allan Poe's "A Descent into the Maelström" the other night. It's a story about a Norwegian fisherman relating to a tourist a horrific experience that occurred three years previous between the Norwegian coast and the Island of Moskoe, an experience so horrifying that, in one night, it had changed the fisherman's hair from jet black to white, broken his body and frayed his nerves (although the fisherman seems to have no problem positioning himself precariously close to the edge of a coastal cliff).

This area of the sea near Moskoe is feared for its dangerous waters. The currents here run in every direction, thus causing the waters to burst into frenzied convulsion. As the tide moves between high and low, these currents grow in strength until multiple vortices form across the face of the ocean. Then, after a short while, these vortices subside but are replaced by the tremendous whirlpool known as the Maelström.

The Maelström had sucked down many vessels that did not guard against its reach; it smashed them upon the rocks at the bottom of the sea. The whirlpool is so strong that whales frequently are overpowered and drowned.

While all the other coastmen collected their catch in the safer waters very much to the south, this fisherman and his two brothers choose to fish off of Moskoe and its neighboring islands. This meant they had to sail through the area of the Maelström. This was possible, for at times of high and low tide, the water became tranquil for a period of 15 minutes. Although through passage was still dangerous, the fertility of the fishing grounds on the other side made it worth their while.

The fishing had been good on that particular day in question. When the fisherman's watch read seven, he and his brothers headed back toward port, thus allowing them to sail through the area of the Maelström during the slack-time.

As they were sailing home, an unusual breeze picked up and the waters became rough. It was then they noticed the whole horizon was "covered with a single coppered-colored cloud that rose with the most amazing velocity." Before they knew it, the three brothers were overtaken by a hurricane of a strength never known to have occurred in Norwegian waters.

The younger brother tied himself to the mainmast, which then immediately was ripped off, carrying the little brother overboard with it. The fisherman held on to a ringbolt as the boat was battered by the storm's waves. The older brother came up to the fisherman and yelled out the single word "Moskoe-ström!" (Norwegian for Maelström). The fisherman's watch had run down at seven, and the time was much later than he believed. He now realized the boat was heading right into the Maelström during a hurricane.

The boat entered the lip of the Maelström. Fear paralyzed the fisherman as he held onto the ring-bolt and his brother clung to a securely lashed water-cast. Cycling around and around in the Maelström, the boat made its way toward the center pit of the whirlpool.

It was then when the fisherman realized his fate. Having decided to hope no more, he rid himself of the terror that unmanned him at first and a peace came over the fisherman.

The eye of the hurricane was directly overhead, thus allowing the moon's light to illuminate the sea about the boat. The fisherman became amazed at the beauty and magnificence of the Maelström. His only regret was that he was not going to survive to tell others about the wonderful manifestation within which he came to find himself.

While observing the beauty around him, the fisherman noticed larger objects were drawn down faster to the center of the Maelström than smaller ones. It was then the older brother made his way to the ringbolt and, in the act of a madman and raving through sheer fright, endeavored to force the fisherman's hands, for the ringbolt was not large enough for two people to hold. The fisherman, feeling sorry for his brother, let him have the ringbolt. He moved to the water-cast, attached himself to it and cut himself loose from the boat.

The boat, being of large size, was sucked down the center of Maelström, taking the older brother with it. The fisherman rode around in the whirlpool until the next time of slack, where upon he was carried by a strong current to safety.

Overtly, the theme of the story is enlightenment and salvation through terror. But underlining this theme is one of knowing when to let go.

We all eventually will come in our lives to moments of great difficulty and pain, be it failure, illness, death, separation, divorce or dissolution of a family.

As my life has recently become unraveled, I tethered myself to my past. Too flurried to think and paralyzed by fear, panic and despair, I instinctively grasped on to these tethers with the unrealistic hope that if and when the storm subsides, I might be able to pull myself back up one of these lines. Maybe things could be made right again. As long as I held onto false hope, I was crippled by instinct and devoid of clear thought. My situation dictated that going back is not an option, but I could not see through the mist and spray thrown up by my storm.

Recent explicit events have forced me to recognize the hopelessness of my situation. I see now that fastening myself to the past, as was the actions of the fisherman's brothers, is only going to drown me. I am cutting loose from my tethers.

Once one realizes that it is hopeless trying to return to the place one once was, that person must cut free and jump overboard into the elements. One might still be within a whirlpool within a hurricane and, like myself, might not have moonlight illuminating the direction of personal salvation, but the alternative is certain destruction at the bottom of the Maelström.

Students want safe campus, new campus financial system

In order for K-State to propel itself into the next millennium, we must work to make this university a safe, student-friendly campus poised to attract the best and brightest students in the years to come.

At the same time, we need to handle the wants and needs of current students more efficiently in order to make everyone's collegiate experience more rewarding and fulfilling. We believe our three proposals will help take K-State and Student Governing Association to new heights.

First, we think the more conveniences we can provide for students on campus will in turn lead to more use of these services. Therefore we are proposing a university-wide account so no matter where students go on campus, they can charge to this centralized account and pay their bill once, at the end of each month.

This potentially would allow everyone to pay one check for all fees assessed through the residence halls, K-State Union Bookstore, Lafene Health Center, Telecommunications and many other locations on campus.

Information on individual accounts could be accessed through KATS, and at the end of the month, everyone would receive an itemized statement of activity.

Second, campus safety always has been a subject that is talked about a lot, but there is seldom anything done to improve safety on campus.

Our proposed solution to this problem is to increase the number and awareness of the blue emergency lights on campus. The blue lights are designed so that students who need help can press the button and call for help.

In theory, this is an excellent idea. However, the sparsely distributed blue-light system on campus is highly ineffective due to the fact there are so few of them.

We suggest that in the long-run two blue lights should be visible from any location on campus. Two visible lights would allow a person being followed, to press one and continue to walk to the next without having to stop and allow the pursuer to catch up.

Finally, we believe all students should have a voice in what their tuition dollars support.

In order to accomplish this objective, we propose students be allowed to choose what $1 per credit hour aids. Our plan to implement this would require students to check a box on their tuition payment to indicate their choice of five locations to support.

We would like to see the five choices be funding for Hale Library, Lafene, Union Activities Board, a technology fund, and if students do not wish to decide on any of these, then a fifth option would allow students to allow SGA to distribute the remainder.

We are convinced these issues, if implemented, would help make K-State a safer, more student-friendly campus where common people have input in important issues.

Dream of K-State includes campus beauty, new coach

While trying to hang a picture in my bathroom, I slipped and bashed my head on the edge of the toilet. During the progress of the next hour or so, I had wonderful dreams of a better and more beautiful campus.

I envisioned a basketball coach that was still on the bench in the middle of March instead of driving his Mercedes to the golf course. I depicted a place where cars easily could park and go, except for the one day when Conan O'Brien was a Landon Lecturer. I saw a credit on my financial aid where K-State had given me three free hours. I felt the cool mist of a fountain hitting my cheek, then realized that it was my dog Einstein's tongue and that he had just raided the litter box.

Although this scene may seem like it was taken from the next Quentin Tarantino movie, it is what Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea see as the future of Kansas State University. There are many obvious issues that are being discussed by our opponents, but we prefer to address the more obscure subjects.

The first of these is overall campus beautification. If elected, we would solicit alumni money toward the placement of a fountain, preferably between Seaton Hall and the Union. What is supposed to be the social center of campus is marked now by a concrete median and two light poles. We need a focal point, and one could not conceive of a better image than a picturesque water fountain.

The second point of our "dream" would be the hiring of a new basketball coach. While Tom Asbury has had a few shining moments during his tenure as head basketball coach, his overall performance has been dismal at best.

K-State men's basketball has only made top billing on Sportscenter when a player has been caught hanging out with Mary Jane or sent back to his home country for "personal reasons." Asbury has never seemed to fit in with the image of Wildcat basketball, and some of his recruiting decisions have left us wondering if he was pursuing college students or cast members for "The Real World."

Two words for Athletic Director Max Urlick: Bob Chipman.

Our final point is the implementation of a reward system for students attaining a minimum

3.0 grade point average per semester. We propose that a credit of three free credit hours (about $200) be given to those students who receive a 3.0 GPA or above the previous semester. It is time that we allow needed funds to trickle down, for it is better to help a lot of people a little than to help a few people a lot.

Fellow students, we believe that the best years of K-State lie ahead of us. As we enter a new millennium, let us leave a mark on this campus that will still be visible to Wildcats that attend well into the future. Please cast your vote for Wooten/Shea, SGA president and vice president.

READERS write

Students disagree with recent privilege-fee decisions

We are writing in regard to the Student Senate's recent actions concerning privilege-fee issues. The way the Senate has handled itself over issues on funding KSDB-FM 91.9 and the library is pathetic.

First, although the Collegian seems to think KSDB is worthy of front-page news for several weeks on end, not everyone on campus gives a damn about it. Few of us listen to it more than the few seconds it takes for the radio to scan to the next station. It was getting more than a little annoying hearing of the controversy about what music the station should play, but because we don't listen to it, we didn't care and had no serious gripe about it.

However, since the Senate so graciously offered to bail out the radio station with our money, we now are involved. We have a couple of questions concerning this issue: First, why weren't we (as privilege-fee-paying students) consulted on this decision, and second, why should we have to pay money out of our own pockets to save a radio station (a glorified university "service") from its own poor management and incompetency especially when we don't even listen to it? This is not our responsibility, and we should not have to pay for it.

The thing that is really upsetting in all this is the fact that the library is just about as useless as the radio station. Our success rate for finding what we need in the library is practically nonexistent. Instead, we have been forced to resort to the community library or Internet resources. This is a problem. In the last several years, nothing of significance has been done to improve the library other than the aesthetic appearance. Obviously, if the situation is going to be improved, it must be done by the students. This means either a privilege fee or a tuition increase. We feel a good library is not a "privilege" and therefore should not be funded by a student fee. Plus, with SGA's bipolar reputation over the past few years, who knows how long that fee would be in effect?

We suggest a tuition increase. We would gladly pay a few bucks more in tuition in order to improve the library. Our educational experience would be greatly enhanced by this improvement, and it would be a permanent fix for an important but easily solvable problem.

Baseball team starts tournament

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

K-State returns to the diamond at 6 tonight to face Western Michigan in the first game of the Jacksonville Kennel Club Classic in Jacksonville, Fla.

The Wildcats will play three games over the course of the weekend, facing Xavier on Saturday at 10 a.m. and Austin Peay on Sunday at 11 a.m.

After dropping all three games at Baylor last weekend, the Cats fell to 6-8 on the year and will look to rebound against the Broncos today, a team that has been stuck in a three-game losing skid.

Against Baylor, the Wildcats played the nationally ranked Bears close in two of the three games but faltered in key moments, especially the third game, a 7-6 loss in 10 innings.

"I have no problem with our effort at all," head coach Mike Clark said. "Our attitude has been super, we just need to execute a little better."

Struggling to execute the most has been the starting pitching for K-State. Only once has a Wildcat starter pitched seven innings in the Cats' 14 games. The rotation again will take on another look for the tournament, with junior Jason Wells (1-1) returning to the rotation Saturday. Senior Derek Andersen (1-3) will get the nod to start tonight, with freshman Brett Reid (1-0) closing the series on Sunday.

"We definitely need to get ahead in the count more often," assistant coach Mike Hensley said.

"When we get into a position to put somebody away, we've got to do that," he said.

The Cats will face two successful offensive teams in Xavier, 2-5 overall, and Austin Peay, 4-6 overall.

Xavier sports a collective average of .274, highlighted by Ty Benning, who leads the starters with a .364 average and a .588 on base percentage.

Austin Peay heads into the tournament with a team average of .292, led by Buddy Dubois' .390 mark.

Not far behind is Lance Wampler, who is second on the team with a .355 average, is first in home runs with three and is second in runs batted in with nine.

For K-State, the bats never really came alive until the final game of the Baylor series, when the Wildcats pounded out a season-best four home runs.

"We just hit their mistakes," Clark said. "When you get those opportunities, you need to take advantage of them and we did in those cases."

Despite the influx of homers, K-State remains a team that relies on the short game, Clark said.

Statistics for Wildcat batsmen back up the statement. The top-two hitters for the Cats, sophomore outfielder Kasey Weishaar and junior second baseman Chad Tabor have no home runs.

Weishaar leads the team with a .447 average, slightly ahead of Tabor, who is sporting a .415 average heading into the tournament.

Inconsistency has been a problem so far for the Cats at the plate. Reid is the only other player above the .300 mark at .306.

"It's really just a combination of a bunch of things — fundamentals like putting the ball in play when we have runners in scoring position and not striking out as much," senior closer/outfielder Andy Silva said.

Rebounding this weekend will be key for the Cats, because after a single home game Wednesday against Doane, K-State will travel to Austin, Texas, to face the Longhorns.

However, Clark said he doesn't want his team members thinking about who their next opponent is.

"I'm a lot more concerned with us than who we play," Clark said. "If we play our game, pitch and compete up at the plate, we'll be fine no matter who we're playing."

Cats advance in Big 12 Tournament

STORIES BY FRANK FLATON ■ PHOTO BY JILL JARSULIC

On the opening day of the Big 12 tournament at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo., the K-State men's basketball team caught fire from the field shooting 59 percent to keep its championship hopes alive by knocking off the 10th-seed Texas A&M 87-76.

In addition to the Wildcats' strong shooting efforts, K-State posted six players in double figures and forced the Aggies to give up 13 turnovers and shoot just 41 percent.

"I thought we played particularly well on the offensive end," head coach Tom Asbury said. "We had trouble guarding them in College Station, and we had trouble guarding them tonight. They did very well. They're a good team."

Although the Wildcats played well offensively, Asbury said their defensive effort was not as productive.

"I think that was one of the better games we played this year offensively, certainly not defensively," he said. "They are very good offensively. We have got to play better defensively and get rebounds."

The Cats struck revenge for a Feb. 10 defeat at the hands of the Aggies in College Station, Texas 79-74. With Thursday's victory, K-State moves to 19-11 on the season.

K-State, the seventh seed in the tournament, has tied its highest finish in the Big 12 Tournament with the victory over the Aggies. The Cats move into the second round to play Missouri. Last season, the Cats also reached the second round, but lost to Kansas 68-61.

Texas A&M has lost five of its last six games and moves to 12-15 on the season, most likely not making it to the National Invitational Tournament.

in the first eight minutes of play. Despite the Wildcats' shooting, they could only manage to tie the game at 19 after the Aggies battled back from a 12-5 deficit.

K-State kept it close, though, and eventually notched the game at 33-33 before going on an 8-2 run to end the half at 41-35.

"We just wanted to pick up our defense a little bit," Asbury said. "We really had to pick it up. I was not confident until the minute and half to the minute mark. They got some guys who can light it up."

The Wildcats extended the lead to 15 when Dies tossed in back-to-back field goals including an explosive slam dunk. Texas A & M stayed in it by capitalizing on K-State fouls and hitting 17 free throws, but the Wildcats grabbed their largest lead of the game when May hit two in a row to put the Cats up by 16 with just under six minutes to go.

After Dies slammed in a basket with 6:17 remaining, the Aggies cut the deficit to nine with 5:19 to go in the game on a Michael Schmidt three, but Dies silenced the Aggie faithful again with yet another jam.

Texas A&M cut its deficit to 10 until Chris Griffin scored five straight points to put the game out of the reach of the Aggies.

May attributed the win to K-State picking up its defense and playing a strong offensive game, unlike the Wildcats' last game against Colorado.

"In that game, we weren't getting the job done," he said. "In this game, we picked up our defense and started getting open shots. We came out and won the game."

Manny Dies added to his 19 points from senior night in Nebraska by pacing the Cats with 19 and six rebounds. Senior guard Ayome May added fifteen, while junior guard Cortez Groves had 14. Leading the way for the Aggies was senior forward Shanne Jones, who poured in 17 and guard Clifton Cook, who had 15.

"They played great offensively," senior forward/center Shawn Rhodes said. "I'm glad we played a better offensive game. If we can get all of us to shoot well, we will do well. A lot of guys stepped up."

In the first half, the Wildcats led by Josh Reid and Rhodes, came out shooting. Reid exploded for eight of the Wildcats' first 10 points including two three-pointers.

K-State shot 80 percent in the first eight minutes of play. Despite the Wildcats' shooting, they could only manage to tie the game at 19 after the Aggies battled back from a 12-5 deficit.

K-State's Manny Dies goes up to get a shot past Joe White of Texas A&M during second-half action Thursday night during the first round of Big 12 play at Kemper Arena, Kansas City, Mo. Dies was the leading scorer for the Cats, with 19 points. There were six players in double figures.

Men's team battles second-seed Missouri tonight

After beating Texas A&M 87-76 in the opening round of the Big 12 tournament, the K-State men's basketball team will now focus on advancing in the tournament by attempting to topple second-seed Missouri at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo. at 6 tonight.

K-State has not beaten the Tigers in two meetings this year. The Tigers post a 20-7 record on the season and an 11-5 record in Big 12 play.

With a victory, the Wildcats would go to the third round of the Big 12 tournament and could achieve their best performance in the Big 12 tournament since its inception in 1997.

The Wildcats first lost to Missouri at home 78-73. K-State shot 40 percent, while Tiger Big 12 Player of the Year Albert White poured in 21 points. In the second meeting, the Tigers beat the Cats 70-63 at the Hearn Center in Columbia, Mo. as the Cats shot a lowly 39 percent from the field.

Despite losing twice this season to Missouri, senior guard Ayome May said he knows what they need to do to defeat the Tigers and move on in the Big 12 tournament.

"We've played them twice this year," he said. "We know what they do, they know what we do. We just have to play well and execute."

Missouri is lead by White, who averages 16.4 points and 8.5 rebounds a game; John Wood, who averages 11.8 points; and Big 12 All-Freshman team member Keyon Dooling.

K-State head coach Tom Asbury said the Tigers are very deep and Dooling was effective in the previous two meetings.

"The two games were very different, but Dooling hurt us in both games," he said. "He is a big factor. We have got to contain him. He is an outstanding young player."

"They can hurt you with a number of guys. They are very multi dimensional.

We will have to play them well defensively."

Asbury said the Wildcats are a very deep team as well, but they have been very inconsistent this season.

With the Cats shooting almost 60 percent against the Aggies in the first round, Rhodes said the Wildcats will have to capitalize on the momentum from that effort.

"A lot of guys stepped up and shot well," he said. "If we keep doing that, we will do well in the tournament. When we move the ball around and shoot well, we are a tough team."

Chris Griffin said K-State definitely has the potential to be the Big 12 tournament champions.

"I think if we win the tournament, it will be easier to get in the NCAA tournament," he said. "We have the team to win the Big 12 tournament. Like Pat Riley says, 'You have to want it like that last gasp of air.'"

Five tracksters compete at nationals

By SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Five K-State track and field athletes will challenge the nation's top collegiate athletes this weekend in the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championship Meet in Indianapolis.

Senior Kenetta Seiler will compete in both the women's weight throw and shot put. Seiler is ranked No. 1 in the NCAA in the weight throw. Junior Anna Whitham will also compete in the weight throw.

Senior Charles Burney qualified in the high jump, while junior Erin Anderson qualified in women's pole vault. Senior Emily Diederich is the lone runner for K-State competing. She will run the 800.

"My goal is to run a personal record," Diederich said. "I guess if I go down and compete hard and run a fast time, then everything will take care of itself."

"I haven't really accomplished what I wanted to yet, but I think I have a good opportunity to do that this weekend, running a 2:06, and that will get me into finals, and then once I get into finals just to see how many people I can beat."

This meet marks the conclusion of the indoor season before the track team will begin outdoor events.

These athletes have competed this season with the ultimate goal of the NCAA's, and assistant coach Mike Smith said they are at the exact point in training they should be.

"They're peaking at this point. This is the culmination of the indoor season, so they should be feeling pretty good, and they should be ready to run their best performances, or throw the farthest, or jump the highest," Smith said.

With the athletes having a lighter week this week regarding practice and exercise, Diederich said the NCAA meet doesn't really change any of the training.

"I think to succeed, I just have to stay calm and confident because at nationals it seems like you don't really have to do anything spectacular," Diederich said. "If you just run about how you've been running then you should do well. I don't have to do anything outlandish. I just need to step up a little bit and it should be pretty good."

Head Coach Cliff Rovetto said that if the athletes on the women's side compete the way they have been, they will be successful.

"I think with the girls, that if they perform the way they're capable, I think all of them should end up being All-Americans," Rovetto said. "Collectively, if they give a solid performance they should finish in the top 15, a good performance the top 10, and a great performance top five."

On the men's side, lone Wildcat competitor Charles Burney said the practice time between the Big 12 meet and NCAA meets should give him time to mentally prepare.

Rovetto said Burney is at the height of his jumping right now.

"Charles certainly, too, can be an All-American. He's been competing really well recently, and he's probably at his best right now," Rovetto said.

Tennis team to begin conference play

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The K-State tennis team opens Big 12 Conference play Saturday in Ames, Iowa, against the Iowa State Cyclones.

The Wildcats (2-7) will try to get off to a good start in conference play. Iowa State is 1-4 on the year and 0-2 in the conference with losses to Baylor and Texas Tech.

Head coach Steve Bietau said he thought the team has the talent to finish in the upper half of the conference.

"If we stay healthy, the talent is there so that the upside of it would clearly make us a top-half team," he said. "The maturity and confidence factor can still vary enough, so that may not happen. I think being in the top half is an ambitious but realistic goal."

Bietau said he wanted the players to transfer some of the things they have done in practice to game situations.

"I want them to start acting more like a good team in the matches and also outside the matches," Bietau said. "You have to give yourself a reason to believe that you should win matches. That all starts in practice."

This week, the Wildcats have focused on specific areas that need work and on correcting problems from the New Mexico match.

"I think the New Mexico match was a very true test," Bietau said. "Talentwise, we are on the same level. It makes it easier to look at what they did that we did not do to win."

Bietau said he had been pleased with the players during practice.

"I think we have had good practices from the standpoint that we have been able to focus a lot of attention on specific things that need to be done," he said.

Bietau said the team is injury-free for the first time all season.

"There isn't anything that is serious, but there are little nagging things," Bietau said. "They are not things that need to stop you, but there are teams that little injuries will stop. Learning how to handle them seems to be improving."

Bietau said there might be a few changes made to the singles lineup and doubles pairings, but that nothing was certain.

Last year, the Cats won, 9-0, by forfeit. The Iowa State match begins at noon Saturday and marks the beginning of a month of travel for the Wildcats.

Proposal supports meal change

By CAIT PURINTON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Association of Residence Halls was asked by Student Senate Thursday to begin looking at making changes in the meal schedule of campus housing.

The resolution, which suggests KSUARH investigate the possibility of offering meals on Sunday nights instead of Saturdays, was first proposed almost a year ago. It also suggested KSUARH adopt a revised meal schedule before the beginning of the 1999 fall semester.

Nick Lander, KSUARH president, requested Senate inform KSUARH next time it decides to make changes.

He said he appreciates its interest in the students' needs, but he heard about the proposal two hours before Thursday's Senate meeting.

"I think Senate should have approached ARH," he said.

Lander said it's great Student Governing Association members talked to Director of Housing and Dining Chuck Werring and other housing and dining officials, but any proposed changes should be brought before KSUARH so they can be discussed at their meetings.

He said any changes would have to go through them anyway.

If the resolution passes, KSUARH would have Senate support to investigate whether residents prefer taking meals on Sunday nights or Saturday nights, as is currently the case.

Student Body Vice President Andy

Macklin said he talked to students, and they agreed with the change because they would rather go out on Saturday nights.

Macklin said it was a part of his campaign last year with Student Body President Tracey Mann. He said they talked to students living in the residence halls, and it was something they wanted.

"It's been a full year since we've had serious discussion on this, and it's something Tracey really wanted to get done," Macklin said.

The proposal also recommends the new plan be put into effect for fall 1999. Lander, however, said it is not possible to make changes to the plan at this time.

"This is impossible because contracts have already been sent out. They are already under the impression they will not have meals on Sunday night," Lander said.

The resolution was held for referral. Senate also passed nine bills cleaning up the wording in the by-laws for the judicial branch executive council and restructuring the housing and dining services judicial board.

One of those bills eliminated the chancellor position on the housing and dining judicial board. Attorney General Kelly Dickson said the bill is meant to cut back on paperwork and eliminate any communication problems between SGA and the residence halls judicial board.

"This is no reflection on the job the chancellor has done," she said.

Chancellor Brian Glick said he

Lander said it's great Student Governing Association talked to Director of Housing and Dining Chuck Werring and other housing and dining officials, but any proposed changes should be brought before KSUARH so they can be discussed at their meetings.

thinks people don't realize a lot of the work he does, and a lot of the bills put into final action that evening were a products of his work.

"I have to say I'm still getting over the fact they would like to eliminate my position after all the work I've done," he said.

Another bill will change the attorney general selection process. The changes will give the attorney general two extra weeks to appoint judicial officers.

Senate also put three bills into final action allocating money to Hispanic American Leadership Organization, KSU Project Management Institute and Vietnamese Student Association for spring 1999 activities.

Two more bills were passed allowing continuance of privilege fees and fees for repairs and replacements for the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Discussion on the SafeRide program was held over until next week's meeting.

Commission alters MEDOFAB allocation

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Money from the Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Funds Advisory Board and facility improvements were on tap Thursday night at the Manhattan City Commission's special Thursday session.

Originally intended to only have three agenda items, all pertaining to MEDOFAB funds, the unexpected cancellation of the March 2 meeting added three extra items to Thursday's agenda. The meeting on March 2 was canceled because of the absence of two commissioners. Three other bills from the meeting were postponed.

Joe Farrar, president of the Farrar Corporation, approached the commission first to request an amendment to his existing plan with MEDOFAB. Under the most recent agreement, already amended three times within the last two years, the city extended a $500,000 grant, a $1.1 million loan and a full tax abatement for 10 years. The loan would be repaid in 15 years.

In return, Farrar would construct an 80,000 square foot iron casting facility and create 260 jobs within nine years with 50 of those jobs created in the first year.

Under the new agreement, Farrar would still accept the $1.1 million loan but not the $500,000 grant or the tax abatement. The loan would be paid back between years six and ten. The company would only add 25 jobs in the first year, but agreed to create a total of 310 jobs within 14 years.

The motivation behind the changes was Farrar would begin by constructing a 40,000 square foot machine shop instead of the larger casting facilities, Farrar said.

Current economic conditions suggested caution, Farrar said, and the company found more financial supporters with, "a moderate step with the left foot instead of a giant one with the right foot."

"It's really not a scaled-back plan. It's just starting at a different place," he said.

In addition, the change was suggested so the plant could start construction sooner to handle an influx of business.

"We need to be in operation a year from now," Farrar said, adding that the company hoped to begin construction this summer.

The commission voted unanimously to approve the change. Commissioner Bruce Snead commented on the changed plan.

"It's been a long road with Farrar, but this is the nature of development. Sometimes it takes a long time to put a deal together," he said.

A much closer vote of 3-2 approved a request for MEDOFAB funds by Paragon Technology Inc., which specializes in computer products.

Following a revision suggested by MEDOFAB, Paragon General Manager and professor of industrial engineering John Wu requested a $50,000 grant and a $250,000 loan to help Paragon's subsidiary, Alchemy Technology, move into a warehouse and set it up for distribution.

Wu said the city funds, in addition to another $300,000 he was applying for from the state, would cover building rent, renovations, job training programs and inventory build up.

If the company created 31 full-time equivalent jobs within 3 years, $100,000 of the MEDOFAB loan would be forgiven.

While commissioners praised Wu and his colleagues for starting a local business, concerns over low tax contribution and the risky nature of the business motivated Mayor Steve Hall and Commissioner Ed Klimek to vote against the proposal.

Klimek cited the risk of giving out dwindling MEDOFAB funds, currently at $900,000 left uncommitted, to an industry with large potential competition.

However, Paragon received praise from Mary Jo Murphy of the FlintHills Living Wage Coalition for wages between $8 and $15 an hour plus benefits.

The high pay was one factor that convinced Commissioner Karen McCulloh to vote for Paragon, she said.

"I would rather risk my money on jobs that pay twelve dollars an hour and require a lot of training than one that pays six dollars an hour," she said.

A proposal to establish a Micro Enterprise Loan Program for smaller businesses from MEDOFAB funds also passed unanimously. Under the fund, established from $50,000 in MEDOFAB money, smaller businesses are eligible to receive loans of up to $20,000 within five years.

Music with a European Flair

Netherlands Symphony Orchestra to perform tonight in McCain Auditorium

By KELLY D. LYNN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The K-State and Manhattan communities will get a chance to experience the music of Europe, tonight when the Netherlands Symphony Orchestra performs at 8 in McCain Auditorium.

Conductor Jaap van Zweden will lead the orchestra in a performance of works by Willem Mengelberg, Franz Liszt and Dmitri Shostakovich. Eliane Rodrigues, renowned pianist, will perform the solo within the Liszt concerto. Mengelberg's work is an interpretation of 19 etchings by Rembrandt in which he depicts elements from the life of Christ.

McCain will distribute handouts of the portraits by Rembrandt that Mengelberg had in mind when he composed this work.

The Netherlands Symphony Orchestra will perform Liszt's concerto as the second piece in the performance.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said he enjoys Liszt's works.

"He wrote fantastically beautiful pieces for the piano," Martin said.

Robert Edwards, professor of music, said he liked Liszt's concerto.

"It is a single movement, rather than a multi-movement piece," Edwards said.

"It's a highly unified and beautiful piece."

Liszt's piece is also original because it is one of the only works in the repertoire with a triangle solo, Edwards said.

Shostakovich's piece will be performed as the final piece of the evening.

"It certainly has melody," Martin said. "It's certainly easy enough for someone who's never heard the work before to enjoy it."

"It definitely shows the prowess of the orchestra."

The Netherlands Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1983 and is the resident orchestra of the Enschede Music Centre, one of the most well-known concert halls in the Netherlands.

Since 1996, the orchestra has recorded regularly on the BMG and Verdi labels. The orchestra also has produced several recordings of Italian opera repertoire.

Van Zweden began conducting in 1992 and was named principal guest conductor of the Netherlands Symphony Orchestra in January 1995.

In addition to the Netherlands, Van Zweden also has led orchestras in Austria, Germany, Argentina, England, Japan, Russia and the United States.

Van Zweden has performed under conductors Bernard Haitink, Antal Dorati, Leonard Bernstein, Carlo Maria Giulini, Georg Solti and Riccardo Chailly. He also has performed at the White House for President Bush.

Van Zweden won first prize at the Dutch National Violin Competition in 1977 and became concertmaster of the renowned Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam at age 19.

Rodrigues, meanwhile, has recorded more than a dozen compact discs and has performed in more than 20 countries.

She first performed in public at the age of six with the Orquestra Sinfonica Brasileira.

Concert to benefit K-State Amnesty International

By JOEY ECK

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Making people aware of its cause and supporting the local music scene is the goal of the K-State branch of Amnesty International's benefit concert, to take place at 6 p.m. Saturday at the Wareham Opera House.

Lynn Tufano, sophomore in education and secretary for the K-State chapter of Amnesty International, said she believed many people on campus aren't aware of the organization or exactly what it does.

"A lot of people have problems understanding what Amnesty does," Tufano said. "This way, we get across the seriousness of what we stand for, with the fun of the bands."

Kim Weir, senior in social science and treasurer for the organization, said the idea for the concert came about because Manhattan doesn't have many concerts, and because the members wanted to get people to notice the organization.

Weir described Amnesty International as a worldwide organization that works toward preserving the basic human rights of every individual, regardless of race, gender or creed.

Because the group is a non-profit organization, Tufano said, there has been a limited budget while preparing for the concert. Tufano said there have been about 10 committed members of the group working on the benefit since September, and that the Wareham has assisted as well.

"The people at the Wareham have been a great help," she said.

The benefit will feature eight bands, three of which are from Manhattan: Ultimate Fakebook, Ruskabank and Collapse. Also appearing will be The Believe It Or Nots and The Playthings, from Lawrence; The Blackwater and Rex Hobart and the Misery Boys, from Kansas City, Mo.; and Java House, from Emporia, Kan.

"Many of the bands we've booked have never played in Manhattan. They've just never had the opportunity," Weir said.

Tufano said she believed the concert would be beneficial for those involved.

"It's going to be a great show. We have incredibly talented bands for an incredibly important cause," Tufano said. "There's no better way to spend five bucks on March 6."

Collective Soul finds success with latest album, 'Dosage'

By JEFF ELLIOTT

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Collective Soul has been gaining momentum steadily since its debut release, "Hints, Allegations and Things Left Unsaid."

The band members went from bidding their time with part-time stints as maintenance workers and clerks to playing as a little-known band at Woodstock '94.

While touring with Aerosmith, the band's first single, "Shine," was gaining momentum on the charts and eventually was named Billboard's No. 1 Hot Album Rock Track, and won Album Rock Song of the Year.

In 1995, Collective Soul's sophomore effort, "Collective Soul," stayed on the Billboard 200 for an impressive 76 weeks. Like the year before, Collective Soul became the only band to get No. 1 Hot Album Rock Track, as well as Album Rock Song of the Year two years in a row with its hit "December."

A disappointing third release,

"Disciplined Breakdown," didn't slow the band down or keep it from touring. Collective Soul continued to appear on late-night talk shows and even headlined the 1997 Blockbuster RockFest in Texas.

On its forthcoming album, "Dosage," Collective Soul continues to win over listeners with its mix of power-pop and rhythmic ballads.

The band begins with the flowing groove "Tremble For My Beloved" and leads into the guitar-driven "Heavy," in which lead singer Ed Roland groans out lyrics like, "all your weight it falls on me/it brings me down." The song tells the tale of Roland becoming the scapegoat to pay for the faults of someone else.

From the popular single, "Run," which is also featured on the "Varsity Blues" soundtrack, to the energetic "Compliment," Collective Soul finishes up the album strong and makes "Dosage" another musical success for the band.

Overall, "Dosage" is a good album. The harder tracks mix in well with the slower ones, and most of the songs are catchy, which makes "Dosage" a well-balanced record worth buying.

Kidd, Beel want safe, friendly campus

By JOEY ECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Creating a safer, more student-friendly K-State is what Willis Kidd and Adam Beel said they plan to do if elected student body president and vice president.

Beel, junior in animal science and industry and vice presidential candidate, said the reason he came to K-State was because he felt he was not treated like a number.

"As the university becomes larger, due to national recognition, we must continue to improve on the adviser/student relationship," Beel said.

He and Kidd, junior in agricultural economics and presidential candidate, have three main issues they have based their platform on.

SGA 1999 ELECTIONS MARCH 8-10

A university-wide account that would allow students to consolidate every expenditure on campus into one account is the first proposal by the candidates.

"If a student needs books, copies, prescriptions, etc., these costs would be put on a single open account that would be billed at the end of every month," Beel said.

Kidd said he knows Oklahoma State University has a similar program, and the university even goes so far as to implement residence-hall fees and meal plans on the account.

Kidd said, if put into practice, the program at K-State would also allow these charges.

"The whole account would make everything so much easier for students on campus," Kidd said.

A second issue Kidd and Beel propose is Willis Kidd, (left), junior in agricultural economics is running for student body president with Adam Beel, junior in animal sciences and industry. They said they want to make K-State a safer, more friendly place.

JEFF COOPER/Kansas State Collegian letting students decide where $1 per credit hour of their tuition is spent. They propose five categories in which students could decide to put their money: Hale Library, Lafene Health Center, University Activities Board, a general technology fund and a general Student Governing Association distributive fund.

Kidd said he feels students would appreciate the opportunity to spend their money where they want.

"Everybody has something they want to do with their money," he said.

The final issue on Kidd and Beel's platform focuses on increasing campus safety.

Beel said currently there are blue emergency lights sparsely distributed across campus that can be used to call in for help in case of an emergency.

"We want to improve on this by making two blue emergency lights visible from any point on campus," Beel said. "The idea being that if anyone is in trouble, they can call for help at the nearest light, yet keep walking if they are being pursued."

Kidd said he thought the SafeRide program at the University of Kansas was a great idea, although he sees liability and cost issues in it.

"I don't know where the fee would come from," Kidd said. "To be fair, probably student fees, but it would be expensive."

Kidd and Beel said they felt funding for Hale Library should be a partnership between the students and the state.

"We need to encourage the state to do their part in building a better future for this university, yet the students who will be the beneficiary of a better library must do their part," Beel said.

Kidd said the library should not be funded by a user fee.

"I don't really think a user fee is fair," Kidd said. "There's not one for the r.c."

Both said their proposed plan, giving students the option of giving $1 per credit hour to the library, would help solve the problem.

Beel said he is excited and ready for the challenge of injecting new ideas into SGA.

"I want to provide a vision for the next century at K-State by emphasizing a student friendly university that is a better catalyst for higher education," he said.

Both candidates said their friendship and ability to communicate with one another easily and often are the strength behind their platform.

"I have known Willis since my freshman year and know he is a hard worker and is dedicated to success," Beel said. "I knew as his running mate, failure was not an option in our pursuit for making this university better."

Cattlemen's Day displays research

By JINA HIPPE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Farmers and ranchers have been coming to K-State for 85 years to learn about new research in the cattle industry. The 86th annual Cattlemen's Day will begin at 8 a.m. today at Brandberry Indoor Complex. Sixty-three commercial exhibitors will be on hand to display their products and services, and 30 educational exhibits from K-State will be displayed. Scientists from several departments will be available to discuss the results of their research.

"Cattlemen's Day is an annual opportunity to update producers on the latest in the research and technology that has been produced at K-State," said Gerry Kuhl, extension specialist in feedlot nutrition and management and co-chairman of Cattlemen's Day.

K-State faculty will update Cattlemen's Day visitors about ongoing beef research at K-State at 10 a.m. Curtis Kastner, associate department head and department research coordinator for the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, will update those in attendance about the research being done at K-State in the area of beef quality and beef safety.

"I will talk about our research programs that are applicable to the beef industry as it relates to the safety and quality of the product," Kastner said.

He said he hopes to give producers a message they can take home and put to work in their operations.

"The major point I want to get across is that producers are involved in beef quality and beef safety all the way from the live animal to the finished product," Kastner said.

The highlight of the day will be the two keynote speakers who will follow the K-State research update. Kuhl said. Andy Revella, president and chief executive officer of Lifestyle Ventures, LLC, will share his perspective of what consumers demand in beef products. Chuck Schroeder, CEO of National Cattlemen's Beef Association, will discuss the challenges facing the beef industry.

"We ordinarily use a couple of keynote speakers to highlight some major challenge or thrust on the part of the cattle industry," Kuhl said. "These should be extremely good talks for our producers to listen to — to see how they can apply some of the information to their operations."

Jack Riley, Department of Animal Sciences and Industry head, said Cattlemen's Day actually started as Livestock Day. As the separate industries became more specialized, it branched into separate days.

Riley said mainly Kansas farmers and ranchers would be in attendance, but there will also be some from Missouri and Nebraska. Riley said Cattlemen's Day will be useful to them.

"Predominantly, the farmers and ranchers will benefit from Cattlemen's Day," Riley said. "Indirectly, because of the recent emphasis on food safety, beef consumers are benefiting as beef becomes safer."

At 1:30 p.m., Cattlemen's Day visitors will have an opportunity to branch off into separate focus sessions and demonstrations, which will be in Weber Hall and at the Beef Cattle Research Center.

"The focus sessions will allow producers to be exposed to more detail about specific areas of the cattle industry, which might be of interest to them," Kuhl said. "The topics are widely varied, so hopefully we have something for everyone."

He said anyone is welcome to attend Cattlemen's Day, and he encourages students to attend the free event.

"One focus session that will gather a lot of interest from students is the presentation by several people from the agribusiness industry that will discuss their interests in new employees," Kuhl said.

About 1,000 people are expected to attend.

"We have normally had an attendance of 600-800 people, but with the focus sessions, we hope to increase attendance," he said. "Hopefully, we offer enough for everyone that it will encourage a greater attendance."

Kastner said the goal of Cattlemen's Day is to present new information to people interested in the cattle industry.

"I hope people leave Cattlemen's Day with a better understanding of their business and the product they produce," Kastner said.

Faculty, students explore religious beliefs at American Ethnic Studies forum

By TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Breaking barriers of different religions to see the similarities among them was the topic discussed by members of various religious backgrounds on Thursday.

A forum in Hale Library, sponsored by the American Ethnic Studies program, united students and faculty members. The purpose was to discuss religious experiences and thoughts. Those in attendance said they agreed that although members of different religions have different beliefs, there are many aspects religions have in common.

"I focus on the things that are the same," Athena Hicks, junior in social science, said. "The things that are important are generally

"IF I AM SECURE IN WHAT I BELIEVE, I CAN HEAR A VARIETY OF OPINIONS AND IT'S NOT GOING TO BE A THREAT TO ME."

— CHRISTOPHER RENNER,
GRADUATE STUDENT IN CURRICULUM & INSTRUCTION

the same for religions across the board."

She said religion is a common ground among everyone.

"Religion is at the core of all civilizations," she said. "It's a belief system."

Group members represented many religious backgrounds, including Buddhism, Islam and Christianity.

Mohammed Zakari, graduate student in education, said there have been occasions when professors have not been understanding of his religion. Friday is a holy day with the Muslim religion, and he said professors occasionally have been reluctant to let students leave to pray.

Many students said K-State is lacking religious diversity, but their university experience has helped them become more informed about other religions. Christopher Renner, graduate student in curriculum & instruction, said American culture is structured with Americans being put into one institution after birth.

"A lot of our value systems are based on an economic system rather than a religious belief system," he said.

By being informed about other religions, Renner said walls that make other religions appear mysterious can be torn down.

"If I am secure in what I believe, I can hear a variety of opinions and it's not going to be a threat to me," he said.

Khalid Kebbi, graduate student in education, said the forum provides a needed outlet for religious discussion.

"It was a very good discussion," he said. "The way we approached the issue was very informative."

facility and an expanded shuttle system as possible solutions to a perceived parking shortage.

The current study is a new one in that it combines both city and university interests, Jerry Carter, director of Facilities Planning, said.

This study not only has the same firm studying both entities, but it's the first one since the city annexed K-State, he said.

A presentation by TranSystems last Nov. 17 outlined seven different options for K-State, from doing nothing to adding a parking garage or an expanded shuttle system.

Research also will be a key, including the price for each possible action and how enrollment growth will affect parking facilities, he said.

The final report likely will narrow suggestions to only two or three proposals, TranSystems Senior Associate Tom Swenson said.

"That's pretty common in a planning process. I think we'll start to make it simpler. A lot were several options on the same theme," he said.

The remaining options probably will leave one involving a shuttle system, one with a garage and one suggesting parking management through fees and spot designation.

That still leaves it up to a final decision, Swenson said.

"I think most students and faculty want something to change, and the million-dollar question is, 'Is it going to be public transportation or parking?'" he said.

Director of Parking Services, Darwin Abbott, said he's been trying to get the campus to answer that question for months. Low turnout at meetings and a lack of concrete suggestions from the campus majority have made it difficult to find out how much of a problem exists, much less finding a solution, he said.

"If we're going to do something, we're going to need to figure out a way to get people involved," he said. "People say we need to do something. That's fine, but we need something specific. Parking may be difficult, but nobody wants to pay $130 or $140 more to get it."

Even the possibility of working with the city on a transit system could fail if it's a system that no one uses, Abbott said. Kansans aren't typically used to public transportation, and rules that might prohibit freshmen from owning cars would hurt recruiting efforts, he said.

The difference between a garage and an expanded shuttle almost certainly would affect the city's plans, said Jeff Barnes, safety and security officer for Parking Services.

A garage might leave the city on its own, and a shuttle would allow partnerships, he said.

The current K-State Shuttle makes 18 round trips daily between the K-State Student Union, the KSU Foundation building and Edwards Hall, serving about 100 people daily, Barnes said.

The current bus holds 14 people, including the driver, he said. At present, the shuttle would have to be expanded to serve a larger route and larger number of passengers.

"We're not set up for a full-scale shuttle right now," Barnes said.

Edith Stunkel, chair of the Manhattan Area Transportation Strategy, said the last city study done exclusively on public transit was completed in 1979 and didn't have an effect.

"Twenty years later, you can read the text and nothing has changed," she said. "My hope is this won't be a study that sits on the shelf."

Stunkel said cost was a large part of not adopting past plans, and "sticker shock" has kept limits on even recent proposals. But cooperation with K-State could make the plan easier, she said. Also, if the city population can meet or exceed 50,000 by the 2000 census, additional federal aid could be available for public transit, she said.

"It's two wholly related planning processes," she said. "I would think if the university goes with a shuttle system, it would expedite a community transit system," she said.

Karen Davis, the city's director of community development, said that students would be needed for input and in sheer numbers to support a citywide transit system.

"The problem is, no public transit system can pay for itself," Davis said. "I think they have to be a piece of that puzzle. If everybody doesn't work together, this will not succeed. Again, the more people involved in that process, the easier it is for the consultant to make a recommendation."

"There are antibiotics for bacterial infections, but people don't build up an immunity against a disease," Currie said. "If they are exposed again, another episode can happen."

For viral infections such as herpes, HIV and genital warts, Currie said there are no cures, and physicians can only make the patient more comfortable.

She said an important thing to remember is that even if the symptoms have disappeared, a virus always will be in the body.

"An infection will weaken the immune system, meaning that even if you have one STD, you may be more likely to attract another at the same time," Currie said.

Blank said it is important to be honest with a partner and be checked regularly, because if people do not get treated, someone else will become infected.

"Tests are totally confidential, and we make it as easy as possible," Blank said. "Some diseases, like gonorrhea and chlamydia, can be checked through a urine test and without an examination."

Lisa Murphy, disease-intervention specialist at the Riley County Health Department, said that testing, becoming aware of the disease and education are important things to remember when dealing with STDs.

"Our goal is to intervene in the disease process," Murphy said. "Anyone that is sexually active is at risk for an STD."

As a disease-intervention specialist, Murphy works to control the spread of gonorrhea, chlamydia and HIV. She said she helps the community become educated about STDs and goes as far as to let sexual partners know if they have come into contact with an STD.

"The most important thing is to reassure people that testing is a confidential process," Murphy said. "Many do not know that they are infected and that damage is occurring. Those at risk need to be checked out and have the process stopped."

As part of an administration diplomatic offensive for a peace settlement, the administration also is considering sending Ambassador Richard Holbrooke to Belgrade in the coming days to try to win Serb approval of the six-nation plan.

"On the issue of Ambassador Holbrooke, that decision has not been made," Albright said.

Holbrooke was a key architect of the October cease-fire in Kosovo that has been widely violated since then.

State Department spokesman James Foley pointed to recent encouraging signs that the ethnic Albanians in Kosovo have been moving toward acceptance of the plan. The key features of the plan include continued Serb sovereignty over the province plus self-rule for the majority Albanian population.

After the Albanians formally agree, Foley said, "pressure on the Serbs to do so will mount."

"We believe that that message will become increasingly clear to President Milosevic in the days to come," he said.

Dole's assignment pleased Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

DOLE

"Bob Dole brings credibility in the Balkans," Biden told a group of reporters. Biden also suggested that Dole's role "freezes some elements of the Republican party" from criticizing the administration's efforts.

The administration is eager for a settlement to be reached by the time peace talks resume in Paris on March 15.

Foley's remarks were devoid of military threats, suggesting that for now, the administration is content to rely on diplomacy.

Nonetheless, officials expressed concern over military deployments by the Yugoslav Army in violation of the October truce. They said the violations were not one-sided, pointing to provocative actions taken by Kosovar Albanian rebels.

On Capitol Hill, Defense Secretary William Cohen said that without a peace plan and peacekeepers, there was a "likelihood of bloodshed continuing to take place on a massive scale, with migrations of tens of thousands of people out of the region spilling into the other areas."

That, Cohen said, could "present us with a military mission in the future which would be far more expensive" than the 4,000-member U.S. contingent the administration envisions for Kosovo under a peace agreement.

Dole has long had an interest in the Balkans. After leaving politics, he headed a group attempting to locate missing persons from the Bosnia conflict.

she said, was when the decision would be made.

"Everyone's initial reaction was, 'no, we don't want to do that,'" Lamberson said.

But those who opposed the move began to see things in a new light, Kissling said.

"Those who didn't agree began to understand," she said. "They're beginning to see what's best."

Barb Robel, adviser of Greek

Affairs, said she thought the decision was a good one because the situation showed no signs of improving.

"They've had a continuing struggle for numbers, and there was nothing to indicate the numbers were improving," Robel said. "It sort of becomes self-defeating after a while."

Robel said the decision will affect not only the Tri-Sigmas but other aspects of Greek life as well. Because there will now be one less sorority on campus, Robel said homecoming pairings would be thrown off, and the number of women pledging other sororities would increase.

As for members of Tri-Sigma, Kissling said they would be placed on early alumnae status. She also didn't rule out another recolonization.

Lindsey Roy, president of Panhellenic Council, said she thought recolonization was a possibility a few years down the road.

"When a chapter starts to struggle, it's hard to battle back," Roy said. "A lot of times, the best solution is just to close the chapter and wait a few years."

Before the chapter officially can close down, Tri-Sigma must turn its accountable to represent the best interests of the student body," Eckert said.

Justin VanNest, student body presidential candidate, said his campaign has no plans to register with UAB.

"I don't feel it is necessary, because it is such a temporary thing that won't be needed after the elections," VanNest said. "We won't do it because anyone that wants to offer just calls us and asks."

In order for an organization to be eligible to register with UAB, it must have five members, be consistent with UAB and university regulations, and pay an annual fee.

Peschka said she hopes this doesn't become common practice in the future.

"Previously, not a lot of candidates knew they could even do this," she said. "I don't think it's fair, and it creates lots of potential problems. Hopefully, it won't happen in the future."

As of Thursday night, no other presidential/vice presidential ticket had registered with UAB.

Candidates obey spending limit

By ANGELA KISTNER
AND JOE HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Campaign expenditure reports, which were due Friday for Student Governing Association elections, did not reveal that any candidates had exceeded the allowed expenses.

Investigations found no evidence that candidates for Union Governing Board, Fine Arts Council and the Board of Student Publications, whose limits were $125, or Student Senate and college councils, whose limits were $50, exceeded their limits.

Each presidential ticket was limited to $3,000 in campaign expenses, which included articles of clothing. The candidates could accept only $15 from individual donors, which included K-State faculty, students and relatives. Each ticket could not contribute more than $815 of its own money to its campaign.

Elections Committee Chair Joe Ashley, senior in mass communications, refused Collegian requests to release lists of contributors to presidential candidates.

Elections Committee Chair Paul English, senior in history, said no violations have been found, but the committee still was investigating.

"We're currently investigating one presidential candidate," English said. "From what we've found, it's probably just a clerical error. We just want to make sure."

To investigate the spending of the candidates, English said the committee randomly calls candidates' contributors to make sure they really have given money to the candidates.

Ashley said campaign finances went well this year.

"For the most part, people ran pretty clean campaigns," he said.

He said there was some confusion on how many expenditure forms candidates needed to turn in if they were running for more than one office.

Candidates running for more than one office have to turn in an expenditure report for each office because they are separate expenses.

Some candidates turned in only one form for all offices they were running for.

Another problem English said he encountered was candidates not turning in expenditure reports.

"We still haven't got some," English said. "There was some confusion about whether or not they had to be turned in if no money was spent."

English said reports needed to be turned in, even if there were no expenditures.

Because of this confusion, English said the committee would be looking into 25 complaint and violation citations.

Mini-golf could fill empty Aggieville lot

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aggieville could have a new form of entertainment coming soon — a miniature golf course.

Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, recently purchased the empty lot left by the Aggieville fire last February and might turn the empty lot into a miniature golf course.

Wilson said he has been doing some negotiations for the golf course.

"Nothing is official or complete yet," Wilson said. "We won't know for sure until at least another month or so, I imagine."

The idea came from talking with Aggieville merchants and customers, Wilson said. They wanted something that would bring a diverse form of entertainment to Aggieville, he said.

"That came up as one of the positive ideas," Wilson said. "We've had several ideas, but this is the one we're kind of going with now."

ages, Wilson said.

"There is a wide range of people who could enjoy it," he said.

Cheryl Sieben, Aggieville Business Association director, said a miniature golf course would be a great idea.

"I think it would be great for Aggieville because it would entertain more of the community and family," she said. "It would give them another reason to come to Aggieville."

Sieben also said it would be good for surrounding restaurants, and it would encourage shopping.

"It would offer us another avenue of being an entertainment district," she said. "It would be just another reason to come to Aggieville."

K-State reclaims trophy for blood-drive contest

By CHRISTINE ROEGER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The blood drive competition ended with K-State victorious against the University of Kansas at the last moment. K-State collected 716 units of blood, and KU had 694.

"The result is very close," said Nancy Powell, donor resource consultant of American Red Cross Blood Services.

Friday morning, it looked as if K-State would lose the trophy, said Mark Barkman, K-State blood drive student coordinator. K-State lost the award last spring, when the university had 536 units, one of the lowest totals ever.

"We started 60 units less than KU on Friday morning," he said.

Right before the results were announced, all members of the mobile blood drive staff packed their instruments together and were about to leave.

"Everybody was in a kind of solemn mood," Barkman said. "Everybody wanted to win."

At 5:30 p.m., Powell announced the preliminary results.

"Some nurses cheered up, and I thanked God that we were lucky," Barkman said.

K-State provided two donation facilities Friday, and KU only had one. KU had three days when the university had two sites available, while K-State had one, Powell said.

"Many students had to cancel their appointments because of the flu," Barkman said. "This is one reason why we couldn't hit our overall goal of 800 units."

The weather was quite good, which decreased the motivation to donate blood, he said.

All donated blood is tested for contagious diseases, Powell said. The American Red Cross conducts eight tests within 24 hours after the donation to make sure the blood is safe and free of illnesses, like Hepatitis C or leukemia, and HIV.

Even though neither school achieved its goal of 800, K-Staters donated more units of blood than their rivals at the University of Kansas.

"Every day, we have to supply 392 units to meet the needs of over 100 hospitals in Kansas and northern Oklahoma," Powell said. "Traditionally, K-State is the largest blood drive at one location throughout the year."

The American Red Cross collects half of the nation's blood supply. The organization compared the donation rates throughout the nation and discovered the Midwest gives more than double the national average.

Powell said that in the United States, more than 50 percent of people are eligible to give blood, and 5 percent of eligible donors actually donate.

A national survey of blood donors conducted for America's Blood Centers found the Midwest has a strong desire to help others with donations. About 80 percent said that is why they gave blood.

A survey carried out with K-State students had similar results. Powell said the most important motive for students to donate blood is to help other people.

"I would still donate regardless of the K-State-KU blood drive competition," Brian Lindsay, freshman in chemical engineering, said. "Many patients need the blood urgently, and I can make more. I don't need all of it."

After loss to KU, Wildcats enter first round of NIT at home on Wednesday

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After missing out on a coveted NCAA Tournament berth, the K-State men's basketball team accepted a National Invitation Tournament bid and is getting set to play Western Athletic Conference foe Texas Christian at 8 p.m. on Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State goes into the game with a 20-12 record and will take a Horned Frogs squad that finished with a 19-10 regular season record.

If the Cats manage to stop the Horned Frogs, they will take on the winner of a Nebraska and UNLV matchup. K-State split its two meetings with Nebraska this season.

The second-round matchup will be played on March 15 or 16 at a location that will be determined at a later date.

The Wildcats made a run at an NCAA Tournament bid by knocking off second-seed Missouri in the Big 12 Tournament, but eventually lost champion Kansas on Saturday.

"Obviously, we are excited to be in post season," head coach Tom Asbury said. "It's probably not where we would like to be, but the NIT is a respectable tournament with a long tradition. I know the players are excited about the chance to play again."

Despite K-State's victory over the Tigers, Asbury said that unless the Wildcats won the Big 12 Tournament, there was no way the Cats would be entering the NCAA Tournament.

UAB passes responsibilities to OSAS, looks at change

University Activities Board relinquished all of its responsibility to the Office of Student Activities and Services at the beginning of this semester.

The group, which approves all organizations that wish to be UAB registered, has not met this semester because its members were unable to agree on a meeting time, said Gayle Spencer, coordinator of OSAS.

Being UAB registered allows groups to meet in the K-State Student Union for free and receive possible funding. Groups must have at least five members and a sponsor to be considered.

Members of OSAS said they do not know when UAB will meet again. Student Governing Association created an ad hoc committee to review UAB's effectiveness. SGA compared it to similar groups in the Big 12 Conference to see how it measures up against other schools, Sarah Dillingham, OSAS adviser, said.

"Right now, we have a committee looking at it to see what changes could be made to make it more effective," Dillingham said. "We haven't seen the proposal yet, so we're not sure what might be changed."

Although UAB has had problems in the past, this is the longest period of time in which it has not met, Spencer said.

Tri-Sigma house available when chapter closes in May

The K-State chapter of Sigma Sigma Sigma will cease to exist May 14.

The sorority officially relinquished its chapter Friday after members voted to turn their charter into the national organization.

Kelli Benjamin, Tri-Sigma president, said response to the move has been much what she expected.

"There really haven't been any strange reactions," Benjamin said. "Most people have just been really surprised."

Initiated members of the sorority will be granted early alumnae status, and uninitiated members will have the option of either being initiated or released from their Tri-Sigma pledgeship, Benjamin said.

"We only have two uninitiated members right now," she said. "Both of them are leaning towards going ahead and getting initiated this semester, but they haven't made that decision yet."

The Tri-Sigma national organization said the Tri-Sigma house will be available for lease once the chapter closes in May.

Benjamin said that to her knowledge, no one yet has shown interest in leasing the house.

Case to test law that keeps offenders beyond sentence

OLATHE, Kan. — A Kansas law that allows the state to keep sexual predators in custody beyond their sentences will be tested this spring at a trial to determine whether a confined sexual predator should be released.

A Johnson County judge on Friday set a May 19 trial date for Jerry Inman, who was convicted in 1994 of molesting three girls.

Inman's attorney, Darrell Smith, said that Inman has made remarkable progress and that his condition has improved enough that he can be released from the maximum-security predator unit at the Larned Correctional Mental Health Facility.

If the judge agrees, Inman, 50, will be the first Kansas inmate moved into a less-secure transitional release program, where counseling and treatment will continue.

Filmmaker Stanley Kubrick dies Sunday at age 70

LONDON — Stanley Kubrick, a visionary craftsman whose films — including "Dr. Strangelove" and "A Clockwork Orange" — reflected an often violent and despairing view of life, died Sunday. He was 70.

Police said there were no suspicious circumstances.

Library is key issue in debate

■ Event offers candidates chance to discuss salaries, SafeRide, voting.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student election campaigns hit the final stretch Friday as presidential candidates had their second debate in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

One of the main issues discussed was library funding. All agreed the library needed increased funding, but the candidates disagreed on how to do it.

Chris McCarthy, junior in physical anthropology, said the inside of Hale Library needs to be as nice as the outside.

"We would really like to see some improvement inside of Hale Library," McCarthy said.

McCarthy said the library lags behind the other Big 12 Conference universities in terms of useful information.

"We would really like to see some alumni funds getting privilege fees to pay for some new books, journals and improve the audio-visuals in there," McCarthy said. "It is sorry to say, but the useful information inside of Hale Library is kind of pathetic."

Justin VanNest, senior in political science, said he wants students to be able to get valuable information from the K-State library not another university. VanNest said library funding for K-State is $4 million behind the number 10 school in the Big 12.

"We need to make sure that the library is taken care of," VanNest said. "A lot of students use the library and can't find the materials they need."

Vice presidential candidate Gabe Eckert said the tuition increase Student Senate recently passed should solve the problem of library funding.

"Last week, the Student Senate passed by unanimous consent a $1 tuition increase per credit hour," Eckert said. "We are pretty confident that in the future we are going to have a $1 tuition increase to fund Hale Library."

Eckert said he wants student input on the best way to use the money.

"Jason and I are really concerned," Eckert said. "We want to have student involvement and student input on how they want the money spent. We are committed to establishing an advisory committee to make sure the money is spent efficiently."

Another topic discussed during the hour-long debate was student involvement through committees. Leo Prieto, junior in pre-law and Spanish, and Chris Bainter, junior in computer engineering, are proposing a coalition initiative increasing the campus' cohesiveness.

The goal of the initiative would be to bring groups together, whether it be social organizations or living groups on or off campus, to provide a linkage for the university and a holistic approach to education.

"There are a lot of resources here that need to be used," Prieto said. "Through this program, we can promote campus activity and plan cohesively for these big events."

Presidential candidate Aaron Velasquez, senior in electrical engineering, said he wants the students to take control of their university by voting.

"I think that the most important thing is that students get involved," Velasquez said. "I think that you guys need to get out and vote."

Presidential candidate Jason Heinrich said voting online would make it easier for students to get involved.

"We want you to have the ability to vote online," Heinrich said. "In the long run, more students will get involved. Campuses that have this program have seen increases in voting of over 200 percent. We think it could work well for K-State as well."

Running mates Willis Kidd, junior in agricultural economics, and Adam Beel, junior in animal sciences and industry, said continuing to relate to students will be a key to getting them involved.

"I think we need to increase the communication between the students and SGA by continuing to talk to students even after the campaign," Kidd said.

Rick Wooten, junior in finance, and Aaron Shea, junior in secondary education, said they would like to see the student senators have more contact with the students.

"I think each member of SGA should be responsible for a certain group of people," Wooten said. "Drop them an e-mail, give them a call and see what's really going on in the minds of students."

Students should vote to make voices heard

Think about everything that is wrong with K-State.
Now think about what you've done about it.

Phrases like, "Every vote counts," and "Make yourself heard," have become such clichés, but they truly hold meaning for this year's Student Governing Association Elections. With so many candidates on the ballot and others seeking write-in votes, a couple of votes will undoubtedly decide a few of the elections.

Make sure the issues you want addressed are in line with the candidates you vote for. Look in today's Collegian Voters' Guide for information about each of the candidates running for president, vice president, Student Senate, Board of Student Publications, Fine Arts Council, and Union Governing Board. The Voters' Guide also lets you know when and where you can vote.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Cats deserve praise for tournament play

The men's basketball team and coaching staff get a lot of grief from students, alumni and fans. But for a few days, even the harshest critics had to tip their hats to a spectacular run for the Big 12 Tournament title.

Last weekend, the Cats made it to the semifinals despite being the seventh seed in the tournament. They dropped No. 2 Missouri and had KU fans squirming in their chairs. Even with a coach on the hot seat and having a lackluster showing in conference play, the Wildcats put it all behind them.

The team played with poise, confidence and energy like no other time during the season. Players stepped up and gave it their all, knowing that each of the games could have been the last one of the season.

The Cats, and especially the seniors, should be commended on a great ending to a turbulent season. True Wildcat fans should be commended as well for not giving up hope when the team was down.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds. To call the Fourum, dial 395-4444.

Is anybody else worried about the effect chalk runoff has on the environment?

Hi. Would you please publish this in the Campus Fourum? I call everyday, and nothing ever gets published. I just want to see if this thing really works.

I really think that your editorials are inspirational.

To the person who wanted to know why the Landon Lecturers are always white, Republican men — maybe it's because that's what Alf Landon was.

If 32 percent of the students polled in the survey published Wednesday are afraid of walking alone at night, why doesn't the Wildcat Walk escort program get more calls?

I'm tired of seeing the Powercat everywhere. I want to see more of the old Willie logo.

Tom Asbury couldn't even coach tee ball.

I think we need a little more security in the library. I was in there today, and there was this half-naked guy holding a book in front of himself, and that was pretty offensive. I don't know what really needs to be done here, but something certainly does.

The three best things about the Collegian are Danedri Thompson, Ken Wells and the Conspiracy Theory.

I think Lafene Health Center should take a more proactive stance in educating the students of this campus about STDs. I never really knew about STDs until I got one.

Instead of a new Wal-Mart on the west side, I think that would be a great location to put a Chuck E. Cheese's and another Taco Bell.

I think the people who call the Campus Fourum are just cowards who are too scared to write an editorial with their name on it.

What the Collegian needs is writers with a little bit of humor, not apathy and complaining.

Studying the other half

Women's studies classes provide opportunity to hear different perspectives

Professor Mary Daly of Boston College is in a bit of a bind. It seems a male student is upset that she will not let him into her women's studies class because he is male. On the news, a female student interviewed said, "Can't we [women] just have some space?"

Women's studies classes have received a bad rap. They are often seen as intellectually inferior to other studies and as places merely for women to sit around and complain and moan about "that bastard" and about how women should hate all men.

This is not entirely the case, and I disagree with Daly and think men are capable of making intelligent contributions in class and in no way should be excluded from any study.

When some people find out I'm a women's studies minor, they often question my motives for taking women's studies classes, wonder if I hate men and often ask the accusing question, "Do they have men's studies?"

Sometimes, I let them think what they want. Other times, it's easier to tell them I take the classes because I find them interesting, and they prepare me to work in a field dealing specifically with the issues faced by women and girls. I tell them I'm very fond of most men, but I do detest a few. To their questioning of the relevancy of women's studies when there is no men's studies program here at K-State, I reply with the comment that men's studies have been integrated into the curriculum for centuries.

Men have been allowed to research, form and voice opinions and publish literary works for a long time, and therefore, much of what we read in class, whether it be a "great" book, a textbook (composed mainly of male research), or philosophical theories, are studies of men's thoughts, opinions, talents and experiences. For the longest period of time, women's experiences, talents and opinions were ignored by the population. Studies of women were preformed by men and clouded by their perceptions of them.

While female work is being included into almost every classroom, women's studies gives us the "space" to do a close inspection and look into what half of the world's population is doing, what they are saying, what they are experiencing and what they have done and can do.

My women's studies classes haven't been mere female gripe sessions — they've been intellectual discussions about critical and literary texts, events, art, music, film and life. People do often share relevant personal information to clarify a point or show how they identified with the issue being studied, but this is no different from what one may experience in nearly any class.

Most people don't realize it, but women's studies deals with so much more than women. It also deals with gender and culture. It's not just looking at how gender roles are created for women, it's about how gender roles are created for men. In every women's studies class I've taken, we have also looked a lot into culture and saw how ethnicity, cultural identity and gender all play into the way a person is treated by society.

I've found having men in my women's studies classes is helpful because then you can get a male perspective on a certain issue. I often look at the one or two men I might have in a class and wonder if they feel like the lone women who pioneer fields dominated by men. Perhaps these men just want to prove they too can make a significant contribution to a cause. Maybe they're just taking the class to pick up on women.

Perhaps Daly wanted to create a space where women can feel absolutely free to say what they want without worrying about what a man in the class will say. In a social or therapeutic setting, a woman does feel more comfortable talking about issues that deal with women without men around. However, in an educational setting, my women's studies classmates have shown that we are comfortable voicing our opinions with or without men present.

We all grew up hearing stories about the contributions men have made to our society. I think it's good for everyone to learn about what contributions women have made and are now making, what they have gone through and what they are going through.

If it were up to me, I would require every student to take a women's studies or American ethnic studies class. It wouldn't hurt anyone to see things from a new perspective.

If these classes were, as Daly would like it, filled with only the members that the study revolved around, a lot of people would be missing out on a chance to better understand and identify with the human population.

Early detection of cancer symptoms could mean difference between life, death

Last week I wrote about Jeri Slagle, a former K-State student and staff employee who lost her battle with ovarian cancer earlier this year. She was a woman of formidable strength, but sometimes it doesn't matter when you're taken completely by surprise.

Whenever I think of cancer, immediately I think of finding a tumor somewhere. Most of the types of cancer I can think of (specifically breast cancer) are precluded by finding a lump or somehow physically detecting an abnormality. For some reason, my brain registers this as playing fair; the illness owes us this much. This is my naïveté to perhaps its greatest extension.

Cancer owes us nothing. It's a cowardly, vicious disease, and it takes every advantage it's given. It uses stealth to destroy and defile, and the months it gains in its subtlety is often enough to mean the difference between winning and losing the battle.

Problem is, so many of these symptoms appear harmless or at least less severe, making it easy to dismiss them. As a consequence, less than a quarter of ovarian cancer cases are caught while still confined to the ovary. This head start has lethal repercussions: only 35 to 47 percent of ovarian cancer patients (depending on type of tumor) survive for five years.

I recall hearing at a breast cancer function a comment wrapped in anger, something to the effect of, "If this were a male disease, it'd be cured by now."

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

Ignoring the patriarchal effect on research priority is naïve, but even if men did have a stranglehold on every cent of research funding, these men still have mothers, wives, daughters and friends. I agree, not enough has been done to address diseases such as breast and ovarian cancer, and it's time that changed.

Sadly, I can't splice a gene to save a life anymore (but do remind me to tell you about the cow-dog experiment someday). About the only thing I can do is sound the alarm. There's a killer stealing along the fringes of our senses, and while we shouldn't panic, it's always a good idea to keep one eye open. If I can draw half the amount of attention to this issue that my mugshot apparently gets, then I'll be happy.

The next two questions that should spring to mind are "OK, then, how do you check for something you can't see?" and "Uh, Ken, what's this doing in a college newspaper?" Glad you asked. While there isn't a consistent test as such for ovarian cancer (no, Pap tests don't screen for it), the National Ovarian Cancer Coalition recommends a mandatory annual vaginal exam starting at age 18 — there's your college demographic for you. For younger women, the disease may start later; detection starts now.

There are more high-tech tests for those in high-risk groups, which begs the question of what constitutes "risk" for ovarian cancer. Family history is a key risk condition, especially if a mother, sister or daughter has or has had breast, colon or ovarian cancer, and those with such a history are more likely to develop the cancer at a younger age. Additional risk factors include a personal cancer history (particularly breast, colon, or endometrial cancer), uninterrupted ovulation (lack of pregnancies or never used birth control pills), and increasing age. These conditions are not a license to panic but definitely a reason to be aware.

During my extended vacation from the English department, one of my former instructors, Lillian Kremer, took a semester off to wage her fight against breast cancer. I was nothing less than delighted to come back to the department last fall and see her back in Denison Hall, back in the classroom, back from her battle. There is this sort of spiritual sigh of relief, or at least a feeling of indebtedness to whatever you worship or believe in, whether it's God or just the karma wave. Sometimes you just need to say "thank you."

Warning signs

According to the National Ovarian Cancer Coalition, these are some symptoms of ovarian cancer.

- Pelvic or abdominal pain or discomfort
- Vague but persistent gastrointestinal upsets such as gas, nausea and indigestion
- Frequency and/or urgency of urination in absence of an infection
- Unexpected changes in bowel habits
- Unexplained weight gain or loss, particularly weight gain in the abdominal region
- Pelvic and/or abdominal swelling, bloating and/or feeling of fullness
- Pain during intercourse
- Ongoing fatigue
- Abnormal post-menopausal bleeding (this symptom is rare)

Against cancer, sometimes we lose, sometimes we win. I just want us to start getting in the first shots.

I have a favor to ask of the administration, my first and last. Denison Hall's fate is sealed; it's been slated for destruction almost since the last brick was placed. Everyone wants it leveled to clear the view of Hale Library. This is fine — it would make a great stretch of pristine grass to study and relax on at this campus of ever-expanding concrete. But I want just one tree. I want a tree that brightens this area in the same way Jeri did to the basement of Denison. I want a tree which not only pays tribute to her but to Dr. Kremer, to everyone who fought their battles against cancer, win or lose, to everyone who had their lives changed by this disease.

I want someone to walk by this tree, someday, and look at a plaque and wonder what was so bad about cancer to warrant this much noise.

After convincing wins against Texas A&M and Missouri, the men's basketball team loses to Kansas for the third time this season, dashing hopes of an NCAA bid.

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KANSAS CITY, Mo.— The third time was almost a charm.

After the K-State men's basketball team shot 53 percent from the floor and knocked off two opponents they haven't beaten in regular season play, it almost looked as if Manny, May and the Miracles were going to pull off yet another surprise in postseason play Saturday night during the third round of the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

Instead, the Wildcats gave up a one-point lead with five minutes to go and ran out of gas down the stretch to lose to third seed and intrastate rival Kansas 69-58 at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

KU was the eventual Big 12 Tournament champions when they beat Oklahoma State 53-37 on Sunday.

"I think they made all the plays down the stretch they needed to," head coach Tom Asbury said. "We had a chance to win, and we didn't do it. It's not a whole lot more complicated than that."

"Bosch is a very good player, a very good shooter," senior guard Chris Griffin said. "I have to admit he got the best of me today. You got to give credit to KU. They had a lot of confidence in their ability to beat us.

"I was looking forward to winning this game and beating Oklahoma State."

The Wildcats started strong by getting out to a 11-4 lead on a Dies' jumper. KU bounced back on a Bosch three to ignite a 6-2 run to get within three with eight minutes to go. Josh Reid silenced the Jayhawk charge with a three with just under eight minutes to go.

Then Ryan Robertson lead KU back as the Jayhawks went on a 6-0 run to tie the game at 21.

K-State took the lead with 1:20 left, but Chenowith tied the game at 31 with just two seconds to end the half.

K-State started the half with the lead on a May jumper, but KU slowly started to take charge. KU took its largest lead with 14 minutes to go when Chenowith made two free throws to put the Hawks up by eight.

The Wildcats wouldn't go away, though, as they fought back to get within one on a huge May three pointer. Junior forward Tony Kitt gave the Wildcats hope by tossing in a layup and then blocking a Chenowith shot into the bleachers.

Bosch squelched the Wildcats' momentum, however, with a three to put KU up for good.

Despite the loss and the possible NCAA tournament denial, Asbury said he was pleased with K-State's emotional play in the tournament.

"I think we played real hard at this tournament," he said. "We came here to win this tournament, and we came up a little short."

SECOND ROUND WIN

■ Dropping large leads was something the Wildcats were no strangers to during the course of the 1998-99 season. Would the Missouri game be another Indiana or Oklahoma State disappointment?

Nope.
It almost looked as if the K-State men's basketball team was going to fold against No. 22 Missouri and drop a 20-point lead in its second-round 84-74 victory in the Big 12 Conference tournament Friday at Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo.

Manny Dies jammed an Ayome May fast break pass into the basket and down the Tigers' throats to silence a late 9-3 Tiger run to ignite the Wildcats into a third-round matchup against Kansas on Saturday.

"We just wouldn't quit," May said. "We weren't going to lose this game. We played well all around and stuck with it."

Dies and May took charge in the first two rounds of play, averaging a combined effort of 35 points per game. The pair nearly doubled their combined average over the season as they only put in 17.2 points a night for K-State. Dies dominated inside for K-State, compiling 18 points and eight rebounds, while May was just as effective pouring in 18 as well and hitting six out of his nine shots, including 2 for 3 from the three-point line.

"It was an all-around team effort today," junior guard Josh Reid said. "Our guards and our postman came to play. We stuck to our guns and played extremely well."

K-State shot 48 percent from the field and posted five players in double figures. Defensively, the Wildcats shut down the offensively efficient Tigers by forcing them to shoot just 35 percent from the field.

Rebounding was the difference, as the Cats out-rebounded the Tigers 50-35, while K-State's guards grabbed 27 rebounds. Senior point guard Chris Griffin posted 12 rebounds and 13 points.

Head coach Tom Asbury was pleased with K-State's effort on the boards and especially pleased with his guards' rebounding.

"We asked them to rebound well constantly," he said. "In order to compete, we have to rebound on the offensive and defensive ends."

Albert White paced the Tigers with 15 points and 10 rebounds. John Woods poured in 15 as well, and Keyon Dooling chipped in 12.

The Wildcats quickly left the Tigers behind as Dies tossed in 13 points in the first half, eight in the last ten minutes, to lead the Wildcats on a 17-4 run to end the half with a 20-point lead.

As the second half began to fade away, the Tigers started to chisel at the Wildcat advantage before going on a 12-0 run with 13:03 to go to cut the lead to 10.

After Dies' explosive jam, K-State hit seven consecutive free throws to dash the Tigers' chance for a comeback. With the Wildcats upsetting Missouri and putting up strong shooting percentages in the tournament, May said K-State is a much different and confident team in postseason play.

"We have a lot of confidence," he said.

"We are hitting open jump shots, and we are coming to play. They played well, but we played harder and beat them."

Women to battle Creighton in opening round of WNIT

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Late Sunday night, the K-State women's basketball team found out its season wasn't over yet. The Cats were selected to play in the Women's National Invitation Tournament.

"I just found out about 10 minutes ago," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said. "We were extremely hopeful and excited about the prospect to compete."

The Cats, 15-13 during the regular season and 7-9 in the Big 12, take on Creighton 16-13 at 8 p.m. Thursday in Bramlage Coliseum.

Patterson said she is glad the team's season is not over yet.

"I am thrilled to be in the WNIT tournament," Patterson said. "I think it is an excellent field, and being selected is a great next step for this program."

Patterson said Creighton likes to play an up-tempo style of basketball, a style similar to Kent State, which the Cats defeated earlier this year.

"Traditionally, they like to push the ball," Patterson said. "They run a very high-powered offense and are very intense."

K-State is coming off of a difficult regular season, and players said after a second-round Big 12 Tournament loss that it would have been tough for the Cats to stop playing. K-State center Angie Finkes said the loss was disappointing.

"Tonight's game was disappointing — you don't want to think about the season being over," Finkes said after Wednesday's tournament loss.

With the loss, the team's roller coast-er conference season ended abruptly, but Patterson said the team's future looked bright.

K-STATE HEAD COACH

"I hope that we continue to build," Patterson said. "I think there is a great future here for us."

The team's future begins with the WNIT, and Patterson said the difficult schedule, in which the team played 10 games against NCAA Women's Tournament teams, gave it an edge in being selected.

"I felt very confident that we were an WNIT-caliber team," Patterson said.

During the regular season, K-State defeated four nationally ranked teams, including conference opponents Iowa State and Kansas.

The post-season berth comes after a season Finkes described as inconsistent.

"We've had a lot of ups and downs this season — it's been like a roller coaster," Finkes said.

It was a season in which Finkes herself battled a leg injury and the Cats played some games with only six or seven players. Now, entering the tournament, Patterson said the team is playing good basketball.

"I am pleased to have Angie Finkes back in the mix, and I think we are playing very solid right now," Patterson said. "We are playing good basketball and I think that's important."

Patterson said the chance to play another game is great for the developing program.

"I am so excited to get another week in the gym," Patterson said. "It is tremendous for our young players to get a taste of tournament play, and see what it is all about."

K-State is an inexperienced team, and Patterson said a WNIT berth is a tremendous accomplishment for the program.

"It is incredible to think we are in the WNIT after the adversity we have faced," Patterson said. "There is something special about the opportunity to play in the tournament."

Now in the tournament, Patterson said the team needs to seize the opportunity.

"We need to grab hold of the opportunity with passion and commitment," Patterson said. "I don't want this to be a one-game-end-all for this young team."

Tennis team wins Big 12 Conference opener

By SETH TROTTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State tennis team opened Big 12 Conference play with a victory Saturday over Iowa State, 8-1, at the Ames Racquet and Fitness Center, in Ames, Iowa.

Head coach Steve Bietau said he was pleased by the triumph.

"It was an important match for us to win and put on a solid performance," he said. "I think we did that."

Freshman Alena Jecminkova won for the second straight time. She defeated Kendra Leese, 6-0, 6-1.

Bietau said he is happy with how Jecminkova has recovered from her ankle problems.

"I am pleased with her performance," Bietau said. "I am not surprised. It is consistent with what we have seen from her in practice. She has had to battle through a lot of stuff this year, so I am very happy for her."

Sophomore Martina Pospisilova won her second straight match at No. 2 singles. She picked up a victory over Andrea Simons, 6-3, 6-1.

Although Pospisilova was sick, Bietau said he thought she had a good day.

"I think Martina made a pretty good effort," Bietau said. "She was a little under the weather this weekend."

In other singles matches, sophomore Anna Pampoulova had the Cats' only loss of the day, to Noortje Cornelissen, 2-6, 6-4, 6-3.

Freshman Kathy Chuda beat Edna Vazquez, 6-4, 6-4. Sophomore Eva Novotna defeated Mary Rumbaoa, 7-6, 6-4; and sophomore Natalia Farmer won, 6-3, 6-2, over Karin Westberg.

The Wildcats swept the Cyclones in doubles play as Pospisilova and Chuda defeated Cornelissen and Westberg, 8-6. Pampoulova and Jecminkova picked up an 8-3 victory over Vazquez and Leese, and Novotna and freshman Vesselina Jeliaskova won, 8-5, over Rumbaoa and Simons.

Bietau said he still is trying to work out doubles pairings.

"We are still looking for a combination at No. 3 doubles that we really like," he said.

"One of the advantages of everyone being healthy and having good depth is that we have a couple of options to work with there."

Bietau said he was a little disappointed with how the team let big leads slip away.

"I felt like this was a team that we were capable of dominating," he said. "At times we played like we could, but also never sustained that play. There were a lot of sets where we were up 4-1 or 5-2, and then all of a sudden it would be back to 4-3 or 5-4."

"The same thing was true in the doubles. At No. 1 doubles, we were 7-1 and then they ran off five straight games. That is a concern for us."

The Wildcats (3-7 overall, 1-0 Big 12) travel south next weekend to face Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

Kosovo rebel commanders consider plan for autonomy

By ANNE THOMPSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia — Ethnic Albanian rebel commanders met Sunday to consider the peace plan for Kosovo, but, contrary to Clinton administration declarations, it appeared the deal would not be signed before later in the week.

As promised, leaders of the Kosovo Liberation Army gathered in the hills of the Drenica region, the nerve center of the rebel movement, to vote on a plan for broad autonomy but not the independence they have fought for in a year of bitter ethnic war.

Representatives of William Walker, the U.S. chief of international monitors in Kosovo, attended the rebel meeting, which met at an undisclosed location, said an American source, who requested anonymity.

The source said rebels were expected to approve the deal, and that they and ethnic Albanian politicians would likely sign around March 12.

Former Sen. Bob Dole, who visited the region at President Clinton's request, said in London on Saturday that the ethnic Albanians promised to sign the deal Sunday.

Dole and U.S. diplomats have heightened pressure on the ethnic Albanians to sign quickly as a first step toward ending a year of fighting between Serb forces and ethnic Albanian rebels that has killed 2,000 people and driven 300,000 from their homes.

Ethnic Albanians outnumber Serbs nine to one in Kosovo, a poor southern province in Serbia, the dominant republic in Yugoslavia.

A signature by the Kosovo Albanians would step up pressure on Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic to accept the plan. Their signature also would be a belated success for U.S. diplomats after they failed to gain the Albanians' full cooperation last month at talks in Rambouillet, France.

The ethnic Albanian negotiating team in Rambouillet, which included politicians and rebels, said it would sign the agreement when they met again with diplomats in France on March 15. They said they needed to consult the people of Kosovo.

Since then, politicians have said they would sign if the rebels are on board. Rebels have long been wary of the deal because it requires them to disarm and falls short of full independence. Another sticking point: Albanians want a referendum on independence after three years, but Western powers oppose that.

Top KLA leader Hashim Thaci spoke favorably Sunday of the peace plan. "The agreement process has taken a very positive direction," he said in Tirana, capital of neighboring Albania.

He said again that the KLA should remain a defensive force, instead of becoming a political party with some of its members installed as police, as Western diplomats propose.

U.S. officials who requested anonymity said Sunday it was unrealistic to pin the ethnic Albanians factions down to a specific moment when they would sign the deal. Both sides — politicians and rebels — have a copy of the 82-page peace agreement.

Serbs have agreed to give Kosovo self rule but oppose the U.S. plan because it calls for 28,000 NATO peacekeepers, including 4,000 U.S. soldiers, to police the deal on Yugoslav territory.

NATO nonetheless has deployed about 8,000 troops in neighboring Macedonia for a peace mission and to underscore NATO threats to launch airstrikes if Milosevic does not sign the deal.

Under an October cease-fire agreement, Milosevic agreed to keep Serb police and Yugoslav forces in Kosovo largely confined to barracks. Officials of the Operation for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which is monitoring the cease-fire, said this week that Milosevic has five times the acceptable number of troops patrolling the province.

Kosovo rebels also have violated the cease-fire by attacking Serb police and killing and kidnapping Serb civilians.

In an example of rising tensions, an ethnic Albanian civilian Sunday shot and killed two Serb policemen who were seeking robbery charges in a Pristina suburb.

Serb police forces responded by searching houses for the father and son and beating the occupants. An OSCE official said 15 ethnic Albanian civilians suffered heavy bruises and broken bones.

Forget privilege fees; here's who to vote for if you're a sports fan

I know, you're sick of the SGA elections. You're tired of sidewalk chalk and silly posters. I know. That's what I'm here for.

I have created for you, the sports fan, the ultimate voter's guide.

I presented the presidential candidates with sports questions, and from their answers, I have determined the student body president of the future for K-State. Forget about SafeRide and library funding. This is where the real truth about candidates comes out.

First, let's begin with whom you shouldn't vote for.

The ticket that struggled the most was Chris Masters and Chris McCarthy.

I spoke with vice presidential candidate McCarthy, and he went 0 for 5 on my questions. These guys are the Los Angeles Clippers of the presidential race.

McCarthy's first mistake was explaining that he didn't know much about basketball or baseball and was sketchy on football.

His explanation? He's a Nascar fan. Now, I don't know how you define "sport," but my definition doesn't include driving a car for 500 miles. I'm sure Jeff Gordon is very talented, but let's be realistic. He drives in circles. I can't respect that. I often drive in circles for 500 miles just trying to find a parking spot on campus, and no one has ever greeted me with a checkered flag. He who has no knowledge of baseball is a threat to the values I hold dear.

Jason Heinrich's answers were good but not amazing. His favorite teams were the Lakers, the Cubs and the Duke Blue Devils. All good teams, but not a surprise in the bunch. Just like a politician to be moderate.

I didn't even have to contact Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea to find out where they fit in. They want to fire K-State basketball coach Tom Asbury. Let me explain this for you. Asbury is not the problem. The players have to fulfill their end of the bargain. On Saturday, K-State players had numerous opportunities to pull close to Kansas late in the second half, but they couldn't sink a free throw to save their lives. That's not the coach's fault. Once the referee hands the ball to the player, Asbury can't do anything. Asbury knows the game, and he knows how to coach. You don't fire a guy for winning 20 games.

Leo Prieto was incredibly friendly, but his sports knowledge wasn't up to par. Prieto's favorite team is the New York Yankees. I'm sorry, but I just can't deal with that. The Yanks are the most hated team in all of baseball. I might have been able to accept his team of choice had he been able to name three guys who play for the Kansas City Royals. Problem was, Prieto came up empty handed. This is unforgivable.

The final blow was Prieto's selection to win the NCAA basketball tournament. He chose North Carolina. Hey,

In the end, the guys who deserve the vote of any sports fan are Aaron Velasquez and Brad Klein. These guys were far and away the most knowledgeable. Aaron had to pull himself away from a basketball game to answer the phone.

Prieto, it ain't gonna happen. In the whole scheme of things, the Tar Heels will be lucky to see the Sweet 16. I like a guy who goes out on a limb, but I think that North Carolina is the wrong limb.

Another mediocre showing was Justin VanNest and Amanda Olson.

VanNest wasn't exactly a fountain of sports knowledge. He was more like a trickle of sports knowledge, but he played along and had some good answers. He said he doesn't have a favorite basketball team because he quit watching after the strike. I can buy that.

The post-strike season hasn't been worth watching, anyway. What part of chunky millionaires with horrible shooting is supposed to be fun?

VanNest's pick to win the NCAA tournament was UConn. Not a bad choice. Since losing in late February, the Huskies have put together quite an impressive run to end the season as the Big East champions. They absolutely trounced a tough St. John's team in Madison Square Garden on Saturday. They've got talent and momentum and could have a good showing in the tournament.

I was unable to reach Willis Kidd and Adam Beel. It's unfortunate, but I only can get an answering machine so many times.

In the end, the guys who deserve the vote of any sports fan are Aaron Velasquez and Brad Klein. These guys were far and away the most knowledgeable.

First of all, when I called to talk to Aaron he had to pull himself away from a basketball game to answer the phone. It only got better from there.

Velasquez was actually able to name three Royals players (Kevin Appier, Jeff Montgomery and Johnny Damon).

From baseball, we went to basketball where he named Michigan State as the team to beat in the NCAA Tournament.

I know, it's easy to name the No. 2 team in the nation but at least he could name a team. When asked who would replace Michael Jordan, Velasquez said it would be former K-State great Mitch Richmond. Granted, Richmond is a little old, but Velasquez stuck to his roots.

I like that. The superior sports knowledge of Velasquez and Klein make them the clear favorites in the presidential race.

Forget about SafeRide and library funding. I'll take a president with March Madness any day.

Angie Sullivan, senior in dietetics, and Scott Alexander, senior in social science, will be running 26.2 miles in the name of Loren Edgar, a Junction City leukemia patient, in the Rock 'n' Roll Marathon on May 23 in San Diego. On March 17 they will raffle a pair of tennis shoes and an autographed football at Ballard's Sporting Goods in Aggieville as a way to raise money for Edgar.

Team in Training to participate in marathon for local leukemia victim a marathon might be physically demanding but not as likely to be as formidable as leukemia.

Angie Sullivan, senior in dietetics, and Scott Alexander, senior in social science, will be running 26.2 miles in the name of Loren Edgar, a Junction City leukemia patient, in the Rock 'n' Roll Marathon on May 23 in San Diego.

The marathon is part of the Leukemia Society of America's Team-In-Training program, which trains an estimated 20,000 runners, walkers and cyclists to participate in a nationwide fund-raiser.

Each team participates in honor or memory of a local child or adult who is affected by leukemia.

The marathon was given its name because bands will be playing at each mile marker.

Seven participants from this area will run in Loren's name. Loren is a 10-year-old boy who was diagnosed in 1990 with leukemia, which is now in remission. This is the fourth marathon to be run in his name.

"It's hard to run for three or four hours, but it's really nothing compared to what these patients go through," Sullivan said.

Alexander said he feels running has therapeutic significance for himself as well as the patients and that he became interested in running as a part of recovery from an addiction to speed.

"When I run, I feel like it's a gift for me," Alexander said.

During the four- to five-month training program, participants raise a set amount of money that is donated to the Leukemia Society to help fight leukemia and other blood-related cancers.

Each member of the team must raise $2,900 for the marathon.

In the past 10 years, Team In Training has raised an estimated $48 million.

Participants use various methods of fund-raising, but most rely heavily on a letter-writing campaign.

Sullivan and Alexander have sent 380 letters thus far.

Alexander said he thought there is a difference that even the smallest donations make in their efforts to reach their goal.

"They're doing a lot just by giving a couple of dollars," Alexander said.

Sullivan and Alexander also will be holding a raffle for a new pair of tennis shoes from Ballard's Sporting Goods on March 17, during the St. Patrick's Day activities in Aggieville. Their booth will be located in front of Ballard's in Aggieville, and raffle tickets will be sold for $1. They will also be selling baked goods.

The Team-In-Training Program assigns mentors, who are past participants in the program, to support future runners, support and motivate runners throughout their training, advise fund-raising efforts and encourage communication among team members and with the patient.

"It's a program I really believe in," said Mary Hammel, mentor for Sullivan and Alexander. Hammel is a former leukemia patient and has had a number of marathon participants run in her name.

Because she has participated as a patient, runner and mentor, Hammel emphasizes teamwork and communication with the patients, she said.

"We're all on the same side — to promote and raise money for the Leukemia Society to help the patients," Hammel said.

Sullivan and Alexander train six days per week. Five days consist of shorter runs that focus on speed, and every Sunday they run 16 to 20 miles to build endurance.

"I just started running about two years ago just for exercise," Sullivan said. "I could only run four miles at a time a year ago."

Sullivan and Alexander have participated in two marathons before, one of which was a Team-In-Training marathon in Chicago.

Team-In-Training is sponsored by Runner's World magazine, Power Bar, and Saucony shoes.

Silent Bob speaks out on past, current film projects

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

In his three film appearances, the character known as Silent Bob hasn't spoken much.

Now, thanks to the Union Program Council, K-State students will have the chance to hear the man behind the character.

Kevin Smith, director of "Clerks," "Mallrats," "Chasing Amy" and the actor who plays Silent Bob, will speak at 8 p.m. Monday at McCain Auditorium.

Heide McBride, program adviser for UPC, said she thought bringing Smith to K-State was surprisingly easy.

"We deal with his agent for other speakers we bring to K-State," she said. "We got a postcard that said he was available to speak, so we booked him."

Smith, a Vancouver Film School dropout, first found fame in 1994 with "Clerks," his first feature-length directing effort. The film, produced for a mere $27,575, went on to sweep the Cannes and Sundance film festivals and made more than $3.1 million in theaters.

Through this project, Smith has been given credit by many movie critics with starting the "indie craze" in film making that has made small budget, independent films such as "Good Will Hunting" possible for distribution.

After joining his private production company, View Askew, with independent film producer Miramax, Smith has directed two more films but hasn't found the financial success he did with "Clerks." He is expected to speak to his K-State audience about these past projects and about his latest film, "Dogma."

Fans of "Chasing Amy" might remember anti-heroes Jay and Silent Bob preparing to board a bus at the film's end.

"Dogma," also starring Ben Affleck, Matt Damon, Chris Rock and Alanis Morissette, picks up where "Chasing Amy" left off, with Jay and Bob heading for the fictional city in which "The Breakfast Club" took place.

The film, originally scheduled for release in November was postponed until this summer due to the expected fanfare for the latest "Star Wars" installment, opening on May 21.

Joe Armenta, sophomore in mass communications, said he has become such a Smith fan that he is planning a trip to the small town in New Jersey in which Smith's specialized comic book store is located.

"I'm the biggest Kevin Smith fan I know," he said. "I've got autographed posters, movie scripts and a 'Clerks' screensaver on my computer. I've even got Jay and Silent Bob action figures."

Among Armenta's Smith memorabilia is a copy of the original

"Clerks" movie script, written before editing changed the film. Fans of the film might be surprised to know that in the end of the original version, the main character, Dante, is killed in a convenience store robbery.

K-State graduate Josh Rohr said he is taking time out from his work in Topeka to attend Smith's presentation.

"I have all of his movies on tape, so I think I have all of the lines memorized," he said. "I've already got my tickets for this."

Advance tickets for the Smith presentation are on sale in the UPC office for $5 for orchestra seats and $3 for balcony. If still available by show time, tickets also can be purchased at the door of the event for $6 or $4.

Committee approves CES fee

■ Funds would pay for existing, new programs such as etiquette workshops, internship fairs.

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 5-4 vote by the Privilege Fee Committee Sunday authorized the first new fee request to go before the Student Senate this year — a 3-year, $40,000 request from Career and Employment Services, committee Chair Jeff Meder said.

If the request is passed, the fee would not raise individual students' privilege fees, Meder said. "The increased enrollment is allowing us to spend more money on fees without taking money from reserves," he said.

If enrollment drops below the expected level, the funds would be taken from privilege fees reserves, Meder said.

The request would not affect the annual $10 registration fee at Career and Employment Services that allows students access to listings for on-campus interviews and electronic resume registration.

If the privilege fee is not passed this year, students who use Career and Employment Services probably would have to pay more or have limited access, in which users pay for the specific services they need.

"We don't want to get into a position where we're nickel and diming students to death," Career and Employment Services director Tracey Fraser said.

If granted, the request would pay for printing of employment training guides. It also would pay for the continuation and growth of professional development programs such as the part-time employment fair, volunteer fair and dining etiquette workshops.

The request also would fund new programs such as internship fairs and alumni mentoring/shadowing programs. The fees also would go to the purchase of new technology and the hiring of a network technician.

About 90 percent of students use Career and Employment Services, Fraser said.

The committee members had a lengthy discussion concerning the suitable route to take. The tied vote to send the request was decided by Meder.

"I feel we've given this appropriate consideration," Meder said. "We're sending this to Senate so we can see how they stand on the issue and get a better representative of how the student body feels on the issue."

The request must receive a two-thirds Senate vote to be passed, or a student referendum can be requested.

"There are a lot of services offered by CES," Nick Mueeting Business Senator, said. "I feel that if I want these services, I should have to pay for it."

Students propose mandatory drug testing

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUGUSTA, Kan. — Fed up with drug use in their schools, a group of Butler County students is proposing mandatory drug tests for middle school and high school athletes and others involved in extracurricular activities.

"Marijuana and alcohol — it's a joke," said John Harms, a junior at Bluestem High School. "You can get drugs anywhere, any time."

Youth Leadership Butler, made up of high school juniors from around the county, is trying to rally support for the proposal from state and school officials.

Its goal is to persuade students to reject drugs while providing those with drug problems the help they need to treat substance abuse.

The group presented its proposal last week to district superintendents in Butler County. In a separate meeting, the students presented the plan to state Rep. Peggy Palmer, R-Augusta, and Andrew O'Donovan of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services. Both suggested the students present their ideas to school boards in Butler County.

There are only two school districts in the state — Bluestem in Butler County and Caldwell in Sumner County — believed to have full-scale drug-testing policies.

El Dorado superintendent Kay Highbarger said she sees both pros and cons to the proposal.

"I'm vitally concerned about our youngsters and the choices they make," she said. "I also have a great deal of concern about society that places responsibility for things on schools. What you invest in drug testing is money that's pulled out of classrooms."

Highbarger still invited the students to present their plan to the El Dorado School Board in April.

In Butler County, a state survey showed youth drug use surpasses state averages.

"It'd be hard to name 30 kids who don't do some kind of drug," El Dorado junior Joseph Fritschen said.

Almost half of all high school seniors in Butler County have tried marijuana at least once, according to the SRS survey. The state average is 39.8 percent.

Drug testing is done on a smaller scale in the Circle district as a preventive measure, said Scott Duryea, school resource officer for the district. Students are tested if their parents request it or if the students have been caught with illegal substances in the past.

"We've got a lot of good kids here," Duryea said. "There are more kids making good choices than bad ones."

Some districts also conduct random searches of students' lockers, checking for drugs and other contraband.

Lori Rosebrock, a freshman soccer player whose locker was searched at Andover High School, said she thinks locker and car searches are a violation of people's rights.

"I don't appreciate people going through my things when they have no reason to think I'm doing (drugs)," she said.

The Bluestem drug-testing policy, which is run like a lottery, went into effect this school year. Names of student athletes are drawn randomly from a pool by an independent company, not by the district.

Since August, one student has tested positive for drugs, Superintendent Gary McEachern said. "It's working really well for us," McEachern said. "We've gotten good support. It's something the kids really wanted."

The program cost the district roughly $19,000, he said.

"The big problem right now is funding," he said. "I don't think any district is opposed to it, but we have to choose where our dollars go carefully."

Haitians drown when boats sink in Atlantic

■ As many as 40 Haitians presumed dead; search for survivors halted.

By RACHEL LA CORTE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — The Coast Guard has called off its search Sunday for as many as 40 Haitians who apparently drowned while trying to sneak into the country in what is described as the deadliest smuggling attempt ever off the South Florida coast.

"At this point, they're presumed dead," Lt. John Pierce said. "We searched right up until midnight without results."

Two boats loaded with refugees sank in the early morning hours Saturday. Crew members on a passing freighter reported hearing screams from the water about 30 miles east of West Palm Beach.

Rescuers found only three survivors. A Coast Guard cutter recovered the bodies of two men, and crew members saw two other men's bodies sink below the surface.

The Coast Guard was not sure of the exact number of people missing. U.S. Border Patrol Senior Patrol Agent William Brett told the Sun-Sentinel of Fort Lauderdale that interviews with survivors led him to believe there were 43 people in all — 16 men and two women on one boat and 20 men and five women on the second boat.

The men rescued from the choppy waters of the Atlantic Ocean told the border patrol that one of the boats broke down and that the other boat approached to help. Both boats then went under, the survivors said. The vessels were a 17-foot boat and a 20-foot boat.

One of the survivors, Louis Pierre, was in good condition at Good Samaritan Medical Center in West Palm Beach and spoke to The Associated Press through a translator.

Pierre said there were 16 men and two women on the boat he was on. They left St. Mark, Haiti, Monday night and stopped in the Bahamas on Thursday night to rest, he said.

After they left the Bahamas, the boat started taking on water and sank, he said. He said he was in the water 17 hours before he was rescued.

Pierre, 42, denied that the trip was organized by smugglers. He said he was not smuggled and only contributed $50 for food and gas.

The two other survivors were treated at hospitals and released to U.S. immigration officials.

The numbers of Haitians and Cubans taking to the seas rose in 1998, and authorities said they expect the trend to continue in 1999. In 1998, Coast Guard vessels intercepted 1,025 Cubans and 1,206 Haitians at sea, compared with 406 Cubans and 587 Haitians in 1997.

Pierre said he hopes to receive political asylum and settle in Delray Beach. His wife and four children are still in Haiti.

"I would love for them to come, but not in the boat," he said.

Man charged with poisoning daughters

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CULVER, Kan. — The day young Ashley Ayres was hospitalized with what doctors believed to be a potentially fatal virus, word of her illness whipped down the gravel streets of Culver like a Kansas wind.

Neighbors in the unincorporated town of 167 were in a panic, fearing for their own children's health. The girl's father, Donald Paul Ayres, helped fan the flames.

What happened next seem unimaginable to the little central Kansas town just north of Salina.

Eight days after 9-year-old Ashley went into a coma, her father was arrested Wednesday and charged with attempted murder for allegedly trying to poison the girl and her 8-year-old sister, Chelsie, with antifreeze.

The girls are getting better — they were in fair condition Saturday in a Wichita hospital — but the town might need time to recover, too.

"It's just got us all devastated," said Jane Krecklow, who lives in Culver.

Investigators searched Ayres' home and recovered evidence there and in Wichita, Ottawa County Sheriff Ken White said. He would not say what the evidence was.

On the Ayres lawn, not far from Krecklow's, a small bicycle with a pink seat lies near a trampoline where the girls often spent warm afternoons bouncing toward the sky, neighbors said.

At heart, both are just little girls, their baby-sitter, Becky Bird said. Their bedroom window in the small baby-blue house is covered with stickers of Tweety Bird and Sylvester.

But the girls' lives have been more drama than cartoon.

They have been living with their father since he and their mother divorced and she moved to Topeka.

Their father remarried in December, but their new stepmother moved out after Ayres pleaded guilty Jan. 26 to misdemeanor battery. Ayres was ordered to have no contact with her and to receive anger counseling, and he was given 12 months probation.

Four weeks later, on Feb. 23, law officers say, Ayres poisoned his young daughters with antifreeze — a liquid with a lemon-yellow color and sweetness that can seem like orange juice.

Ashley was hospitalized the next day and fell into a coma. According to the allegations, Chelsie was given two more doses of antifreeze on Tuesday before she, too, was hospitalized.

Physicians at their Wichita hospital at first believed Ashley had encephalitis, a rare viral disease, but when Chelsie was brought in with the same symptoms, new tests were ordered that found antifreeze in their systems.

By Saturday, both girls were conscious and in fair condition, but the poison had wreaked havoc on their young bodies.

The early symptoms of poisoning by antifreeze are not very different from those of encephalitis, said Jack Finchem, dean of the University of Kansas School of Pharmacy.

Since there is no absolute antidote for the exceedingly toxic liquid, doctors can only treat the symptoms as they occur, he said.

The problem is compounded when the victim is young and her system hasn't completely developed.

Within 30 minutes, the substance can get into the blood, creating a state almost like inebriation. After 12 hours, the respiratory system begins deteriorating, and heart problems can follow. After 36 hours, the kidneys shut down.

Ashley's kidneys and liver failed last week, and she was started on dialysis, the girls' step-grandfather said.

Ayres, a 29-year-old volunteer firefighter, was arrested one day after Chelsie was hospitalized. He was charged Thursday with two counts of attempted first-degree murder, two counts of attempted second-degree murder, two counts of child abuse and two counts of child endangerment.

He is being held on $500,000 bond and is scheduled to appear in court today.

CAMPAIGNS

"Maybe some minor violations — minor violations because of confusion of how many reports they needed to turn in."

Despite a significant number of people who failed to turn in an expenditure report, Ashley said this year was different from last year because candidates did a good job of keeping track of contributions.

Campaign expenditure violations have never been a huge problem in the past, Ashley said.

"It's such a frowned upon offense and really a major offense if you spend over 5 percent," he said.

Last year there was problem with T-shirt sales, but Ashley said it wasn't a problem this year.

"Not everybody sold T-shirts, so that was not an overwhelming problem," he said.

The two presidential tickets that did sell T-shirts did a good job of keeping track of them, Ashley said.

Avoiding risky behavior key to having safe spring break

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spring break quickly is approaching, and one group at K-State wants students to be more careful and aware of the consequences of some of the choices they make when they travel.

STD, HIV/AIDS Peer Educators is a liaison between the students on campus and Lafene Health Center. The group teaches organizations and individuals about the threat of Sexually Transmitted Diseases as a result of risky behavior.

"This is a group of people that are students' own age, available to answer sensitive questions, and have a true peer give trained, accurate information," Reita Currie, health educator at Lafene, said.

SHAPE was created in 1985 as a volunteer program, and in fall 1993, it first was offered as a three-credit-hour course. The first step toward becoming a member of SHAPE is an application process, followed by interviews. Once a student has been accepted into the program, a commitment to two semesters of giving informed presentations is required.

Currie said new students are taken through an intensive training process and become certified HIV/AIDS educators by the end of the first semester. Students also learn group presentation and confrontation skills and gain a foundation of knowledge they can use throughout their lives.

"We try to bring in someone who is infected with HIV every semester," Currie said. "Students gain a lot from hearing someone's story who has been diagnosed, seeing how they are doing and how they are coping. It is an emotional learning time."

Once students have been trained through the classes, Currie said they join the experienced members and do presentations to various campus and community organizations about STDs and safe sex. Although the group has done multiple presentations off campus and in surrounding areas, Currie said its first responsibility is to the campus.

"Through the presentations, we give students a basis of contraception and present an idea of whole wellness," Currie said. "We give them all of the options and risks in order for them to protect themselves and their partners."

Lakeisha Jackson, junior in elementary education, said she has been with the program since last fall and joined to increase the minority voice in the group. She said having a student learn something through its skits and presentations is worthwhile.

"It is a great feeling to know someone learned something from our presentations that they didn't realize before," Jackson said. "We are here for the students to help them and the community and provide information."

Beginning Tuesday, SHAPE will informational tables in the K-State Student Union to advertise Safer Break, a program to create awareness of the dangers associated with spring break and having vaccinations for Hepatitis A/B.

Justin Moore, senior in nutrition, said students need to make choices that protect themselves.

"Students need to think ahead and be careful about the decisions that they make," Moore said.

Currie said many students who travel to countries with poor sanitary conditions, such as Mexico, the Mediterranean and parts of the Caribbean, are at risk of being infected with viral hepatitis.

"Students need to focus on good spring break practices, having fun, but keeping themselves out of risk," Currie said. "They need to maintain some normal routine to come back to school healthy."

Currie also said students need to protect themselves against the sun, know where to find the nearest source of medical help, bring any prescribed medication on their trip and to bring their own contraception to make their spring break more enjoyable.

"Every year in Riley County, there is a huge spike of STD cases after spring break," Moore said. "The best thing to do is for students to take protection with them and to stay in groups, because better decisions are made in groups."

Vaccinations for Hepatitis A cost $43, which includes the first injection and another six months later. There are three injections for the Hepatitis B vaccination, which cost $36. This includes the first injection, the second injection one month later and the third injection five months after that. Students who already have received a full regimen of vaccinations for Hepatitis A or B should not require further vaccinations.

MORE INFO?
For Hepatitis A/B vaccinations, contact the Allergy and Immunization Clinic at Lafene or stop by SHAPE's informational tables from 11 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday in the Union.

Senator alleges lax attitude by Clinton

By WILLIAM C. MANN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration has displayed "lax attitudes toward national security," the Senate Intelligence Committee chairman said Sunday, citing reports that the Chinese stole U.S. technology to produce better nuclear weapons.

The committee already is investigating commercial technology transfers that Sen. Richard Shelby and other GOP leaders contend could help the Chinese upgrade their missile forces.

The new allegations will mean more hearings, Shelby said.

"We have been on top of this lax security for a number of years. We've been pushing, we've been prodding the administration to do more, to tighten up security," Shelby said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I think they are beginning to, but ... they waited a long time," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott said he predicted Congress would be aggressive in dealing with the administration.

"I think Congress is going to have to toughen up in dealing with this administration, particularly when it comes to China and the violations that have occurred there," he said on "Fox News Sunday."

The New York Times and Newsweek magazine reported over the weekend that China had obtained knowledge of America's top-secret W-88 miniaturized warhead from Energy Department nuclear laboratories.

Reiterating the administration position, White House national security spokesman P.J. Crowley said Sunday in a telephone interview that an interagency assessment was started in 1996 to determine what damage, if any, was done and to determine that the appropriate committees of Congress have been kept updated throughout.

"Meanwhile, once we knew the scope of the problem, we had instituted a series of very strong measures to improve security and counterintelligence at DOE labs," Crowley said.

Republicans said the administration allows dangerous transactions so as not to disturb always-touchy relations with one of the largest U.S. trading partners.

Lott, R-Miss., said the case is "just another example of where the administration apparently is more interested in engagement

(with China) than they are with what's happening in that engagement."

"The administration continues to resist really getting into what caused the problem and solving the problem," Lott said. "China is getting to be more and more of a problem, both in their human rights conduct and the way we deal with it but also a continuation of their efforts to get technology improperly and then use it improperly."

The Energy Department, in charge of U.S. civilian and military nuclear programs, admits security has been a problem. The agency said the administration has created a counterintelligence office to solve it.

Rep. Christopher Cox, R-Calif., chairman of a special committee on military and commercial deals with China, is releasing a 700-page report as early as this month. In a preliminary study released last month, the committee reported China aggressively has been pursuing U.S. military information for more than 20 years.

Edward Curran, director of counterintelligence, said in a statement that it was unclear how much the Chinese weapons programs might have been helped by unauthorized disclosures of sensitive information.

U.S. agrees to sell air-to-air missiles to Saudi Arabia

By JOHN DIAMOND
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia — The United States agreed Sunday to sell Saudi Arabia sophisticated air-to-air missiles in response to worries about military threats from Iraq and Iran.

Defense Secretary William Cohen also agreed with his Saudi counterpart, Prince Sultan, to increase joint military training to include ground forces from the two countries. The move breaks a long Saudi preference for avoiding overt shows of joint military force with the United States.

The details of the sale of Advanced Medium-Range Air-to-Air Missiles, or AMRAAMs, remain to be worked out, including how many missiles will be transferred and how much they will cost. Congress must approve the sale, but the deal would only add to a U.S.-to-Saudi foreign military sales program that already is the largest in the world, totaling close to $3 billion last year.

Saudi Arabia has requested the weapons for years for use with its fleet of F-16 fighters.

Earlier in his eight-day swing through the Middle East, Cohen agreed to sell Bahrain 26 AMRAAMs. He also planned to discuss arms sales with other Persian Gulf partners.

The AMRAAM, a 12-foot-long weapon slung under the wing of a fighter plane, can be fired at an enemy plane as the pilot conducts evasive maneuvers. An improved model of the missile, built by Raytheon Co. and Hughes Missiles and Space, is more capable against lower-altitude targets.

Senior U.S. officials described Cohen's private talks with Prince Sultan and later with Crown Prince Abdullah and said they covered a variety of topics, from the threat of chemical and biological weapons to security problems with Iran and Iraq.

"Overall, these were very positive meetings," Cohen said.

None of the Saudi officials who met Saturday and Sunday with Cohen issued public statements — a clear disappointment to Cohen's delegation. They also refrained from criticizing U.S. policy toward Iraq, and a senior military official who spoke on condition of anonymity said a Saudi decision to conduct joint ground-force exercises marked a significant shift.

Saudi Arabia is host to 5,000 U.S. troops and dozens of warplanes that carry out deny-flight missions over southern Iraq. Relatively few U.S. ground troops are stationed in Saudi Arabia, and the Saudis, eager to avoid criticism from Islamic countries of being too close to Washington, D.C., have avoided conducting large scale exercises with U.S. ground troops.

"I think we would have to win the tournament," he said. "They aren't going to leap-frog us over people who have a better conference record. They weren't going to take us over a Nebraska, and they weren't going to take us over a team that has won 10 games."

With the Wildcats posting a 15-2 record at Bramlage, Asbury said he was glad to play at home in the first round of the NIT against Texas Christian.

"Obviously, given a choice you want to play at home," he said. "It will be nice to be at home and hopefully we can move on and play one or two more at home as well."

"We aren't going to look past TCU they are an excellent team and they present a challenge."

Asbury is no stranger to TCU head coach Billy Tubbs, former Oklahoma head coach. On Jan. 23 1995, during his first year of coaching, Asbury criticized Tubbs' coaching style.

"I don't want to put a knock on Tubbs, except he's a jerk and an idiot, a negative recruiter, and a real turd," Asbury said of Tubbs in 1995. "Other than that, he's not a bad guy."

"Probably way overrated as a coach," he said. "Other than that, he's just a terrific human being. You won't hear me say that about another coach, ever, before or ever after. Write that down."

Asbury said he eventually apologized to Tubbs, but said Tubbs probably hasn't forgotten the outburst.

"I called him up and apologized to him, and we just put behind us," he said.

Asbury and his teams have never faced Tubbs on the court, but he said he and the players are looking forward to the first meeting.

"We are trying to make a statement on the season," he said. "Obviously, we aren't a team in consideration for the NCAA tournament, but I thought at times we could be. I know the players should be excited about playing at home."

K-State is 4-5 in the NIT. Last year, the Wildcats lost in the opening round of the NIT to North Carolina State in Raleigh, N.C. on March 11, 1998.

In the 1993-94 season, K-State achieved its highest finish in the NIT when the Cats made it to the final four before losing to Siena 79-92.

Big Ten ties record for NCAA bids

By DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Big Ten tied the record with seven teams selected Sunday for the NCAA Tournament. The Southeastern Conference grabbed most of the top spots, however, with one-fourth of the top-16 seeds.

There were no shocks about the No. 1 seeds — top-ranked Duke, Michigan State, Auburn and Connecticut — and there weren't many controversies about the at-large teams taken for the final few of the 64 spots.

The Big Ten set the record with seven teams in 1990, and it was matched by the Big East in 1991 and the Big Ten again in 1994. The league could have gotten the record if Illinois had completed its conference tournament run with another upset over Michigan State on Sunday.

"We don't think in terms of conferences," NCAA Selection Committee chairman C.M. Newton said. "The fact is we had seven teams in. Had Illinois won, that would have won their way in."

The Atlantic Coast Conference will have only three teams, its lowest total since only two teams were chosen for the field of 48 in 1980, when the tournament tips off Thursday and Friday. Newton said the league had a chance for a fourth team.

"Wake Forest really needed to win a game in the (ACC) tournament, and they didn't do that," he said. "They had a chance to play their way in and didn't."

In addition to regular season and tournament champion Michigan State, the other Big Ten teams selected were Ohio State, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Purdue.

The SEC's seeded teams were Auburn, No. 3 Kentucky and No. 4s Tennessee and Arkansas.

Duke, second-seeded Maryland and third-seeded North Carolina were the ACC teams chosen. The Big East, with Connecticut, No. 2 Miami and No. 3 St. John's, had three teams in the top 16.

Duke (32-1), the first team to go 16-0 in the ACC, will take its 27-game winning streak into an opening round game in the East Regional in Charlotte, N.C., on Friday against Florida A&M, one of five teams in the tournament for the first time. The Rattlers (12-18), who won the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference tournament, is the only team in the field with a sub-.500 record.

"If we don't (win the tournament) we'll know that we did everything we could to try to win it, and we didn't let pressure stop us," Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski said of his team's overall No. 1 seeding.

Michigan State (29-4), the Big Ten champion, was chosen No. 1 in the Midwest Regional and will play on Friday against Mount St. Mary's, the Northeast Conference champions coached by 800-game winner Jim Phelan.

Auburn (27-3), which lost to Kentucky in the Southeastern Conference tournament semifinals, opens play in the South Regional on Thursday in Indianapolis against Winthrop, the Big South champions making their first tourney appearance.

Connecticut (28-2) was the only top seed moved out of its natural region. The Big East champions will play in Denver on Thursday against Texas-San Antonio, which won the Southland Conference.

"The reason is because Duke is the No. 1 seed," Newton said of Connecticut's move to the West. "UConn came out second but had to go out of region because Duke was the top seed."

The Big East and Big 12 each had five teams invited. The other multibid conferences were Conference USA and Pac-10 with four each; the Atlantic Coast Conference, Missouri Valley Conference and Western Athletic Conference with three teams each; and the Mid-American Conference with two teams.

North Carolina extended its own record with its 25th consecutive appearance.

The other first-time NCAA teams are Arkansas State, Kent and Samford.

VOTERS' GUIDE 1999

MARCH 8-10, 1999

PUZZLED CANDIDATES

With seven student body presidential and vice presidential tickets and issues being thrown around left and right, it's hard to keep things straight. But, if you can complete this election crossword puzzle you are ready to cast your vote. So, grab a pencil and go to work. The answers are on Page 2.

ACROSS

3. ELECTION ISSUE: Five of the seven tickets support implementation of this transportation system aimed at curbing drunk driving.

5. POSITION: The top office in the Student Governing Association. Seven K-Staters filed for this position.

6. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Gabe Eckert.

9. ELECTION ISSUE: Two of the seven candidates say the city needs to address this area (CLUE: could possibly be done with a busing system).

11. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Brad Klein.

13. ELECTION ISSUE: Five of the seven candidates support this issue which could require starting the fall semester earlier.

DOWN

1. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Adam Beel.

2. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Aaron Shea.

4. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Amanda Olson.

5. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Chris Bainter.

7. CANDIDATE: Student body presidential candidate whose running mate is Chris McCarthy.

8. POSITION: Sixty students will be elected to this legislative body of SGA.

10. ELECTION TERM: If a presidential ticket fails to get a majority of the votes, this will occur.

12. POSITION: Two students will be elected to a 1-year term, and two more to 2-year terms, to this board that sets regulations for the K-State Student Union.

VOTING BEGINS TODAY, RUNS THROUGH WEDNESDAY

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Polls open today for the Student Governing Association general elections.

For the next three days, students will have the chance to vote for 60 Senate seats, Union Governing Board positions, Board of Directors Student Publications seats, college Council Seats and a student body president and vice president.

Polls will be set up from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday and Tuesday and from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Wednesday in the K-State Student Union, Derby and Kramer Dining Halls will have polls from 4:30 to 7 p.m. all three days. The Veterinary Medicine Building will also have a poll booth from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday.

Last year the polling booths in the dining centers were not approved, but Joe Ashley, elections committee chair, said this has already been taken care of. "We've already been approved," he said.

Ashley also said there were problems last year with people working the poll booths wearing candidates' T-shirts and polls not staying open as long as they should have.

Those won't be problems this year, he said. The election committee and volunteers working the polls are going to be trained on how to run a polling booth.

Also, at least one member of the election committee will be at the polling booths at all times, he said.

Some polling booths ran out of individual college ballots last year, so some students weren't able to vote for representatives from their college. Ashley said it wasn't that there weren't enough ballots made but the people running the booth didn't take enough with them. That won't happen this year, he said.

"We're going to have all of our ballots with us at the polls," he said.

Having plenty of ballots at the poll booths will definitely be important in this year's election, Ashley said. He said he hopes their will be an increased voter turnout due to the increased number of people running.

"I'm hoping that translates into when there's more candidates, there's more candidates to have more friends," he said.

Ashley said his personal goal for voter turnout is 5,000, which is about two-thirds more than last year.

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of Office of Student Life and Activities, also said there should be an increased number of voters.

"People are going to have to make sure their friends go vote so they have a chance in those senate races," she said. "We're hopeful."

There has been talk in the past of students being able to vote through the K-State Technology Access System, but Spencer said that's probably not going to happen for a while.

"To my understanding the university has a priority system with KATS, and we are just not going to be on that for a long time," she said. "I've just kind of left that alone."

She said there are things like enrolling on KATS that are more important than student body elections and she understands that.

Spencer said it's important that students go out and vote in the next three days.

"First of all, since there's such an overwhelming interest this year, the students owe it to their peers to choose the most qualified people to represent them," she said. "Fundamentally, it's your responsibility as a citizen and a student at K-State to exercise your right to vote."

If no one presidential and vice presidential candidate gets 51 percent of the vote, the run off elections will be Monday, March 15. Spencer said there will probably be a run-off election.

"My hunch would be that there would be just because of the sheer volume of candidates," she said.

Platforms play pivotal role in student elections

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whether it's a national, state, local or campus election, governmental candidates often come up with a platform to try to reach potential voters. But political platforms are not the only factors in an election.

Student Body President Tracey Mann said the issues candidates decide to focus on play a big part in whether they're elected, but there are two other aspects of getting elected.

"A third of the campaign is issues, a third is promotion, like signs, T-shirts, chalking and all that stuff, and a third is just the people that you know," he said. "I would say that excellent issues can help you some, but bad issues can really hurt you."

Sarah Dillingham, election committee adviser, said issues candidates run on are important to the voters.

"Students who vote want those issues addressed," she said. "If there's a problem on campus students want fixed, and a student leader has an idea on how to fix it, they'll win."

Jeff Peterson, 1994-96 student body president, said he hopes the issues candidates focus on are important to the voters.

"You hope that's a big part, and that's what a campaign is about," he said. "It's about a debate of ideas."

However, Peterson said candidates can improve on their issues throughout their term.

"I don't think they have to be set in stone in the campaign," he said.

Dean of Student Life and former Student Body President Pat Bosco said a candidate's platform is extremely important.

"Over the last couple of years, the winning candidates in the student body elections race have used their platform as a plan of action," he said. "And their platform brought a plan of action to their term of office."

From an administrative viewpoint, Bosco said, platforms also are important.

"They focus on issues they're simply not going to let you forget," he said.

Vice president Andy Macklin said one thing students need to realize is the student body president and vice president don't spend all their time working on their platform after they're elected.

"You spend your whole year trying to take care of all the duties that are listed for you in the constitution and all the random phone calls and all the daily meetings," he said. "Then, in your spare time, late at night, whenever you can fit it in, you work on those issues."

The three issues Mann and Macklin worked on during their term were a Chester E. Peters Recreation parking permit, an advising evaluation program and a book swap program on the Internet.

Mann said he wouldn't have called these issues their platform, though.

He said there is a difference between a platform and making campaign promises. A platform could consist of many things the candidates want to work on during their term. Campaign promises are what the candidates are confident they can get accomplished, he said.

Although Mann and Macklin promised certain things during their campaign, they still worked on other issues important to K-State, like library funding and faculty salaries.

Macklin said they didn't want to promise that they would accomplish improvements in these areas, though.

"Those weren't things we could guarantee," he said. "It's hard for us to Jason Heinrich and Gabe Eckert said they plan to restructure finals week to give students a break in the middle of their final exams. They said they believe this plan would give students more time to study and focus, which would allow them to perform better on their exams.

The pair said they want to expand the uses of the residence hall meal plans to allow students to buy meals at the K-State Student Union with the plans.

"If you have a class during the day and you can't make it back to the residence hall to eat, you can have more flexibility to stay on campus and use your money more wisely," Eckert said.

THE PLATFORM: IN BRIEF

Another plan, they said, is to restructure the reimbursement schedule for dropping classes.

Students have only one week to drop a class and receive a 100-percent refund, but with Heinrich and Eckert's plan, students would have a longer period of time to receive a full refund for dropped classes, they said.

Their fourth issue is the expansion and improvement of Internet services provided to students. The plan would allow students to reserve textbooks electronically as they enroll in classes. It also would make electronic voting possible, which would allow students more access to voting for student body elections and referendums.

A second issue Kidd and Beel propose is letting students decide where $1 per credit hour of their tuition is spent. The two propose five categories in which students could decide to put their money: Hale Library, Lafene Health Center, University Activities Board, a general technology fund and a general Student Governing Association distributive fund.

"Everybody has something they want to do with their money," he said.

The final issue on Kidd and Beel's platform focuses on increasing campus safety.

Beel said that now, there are blue emergency lights sparsely distributed across campus that can be used to call in for help in case of an emergency.

"We want to improve on this by making two blue emergency lights visible from any point on campus," Beel said. "The idea being that if anyone is in trouble, they can call for help at the nearest light, yet keep walking if they are being pursued."

body vice presidential candidate, said one of the things they would address if elected would be the situation of parking on campus.

"We've looked at parking at other Big 12 colleges and what they do, and we see that parking on campus is ridiculous," McCarthy said. "There has to be a solution."

Masters and McCarthy also said they want to reach out to younger K-State students whom they say aren't always listened to.

"When I was a freshman, no one spoke to me," McCarthy said. "We want to give them a sense of belonging, and that they don't need to stay in their dorm room, but get involved in the university."

Another subject on their agenda is the amount of journals and usable information available in the library. They said they would like to see more funding from alumni for the library.

— Nick Bratkovice

THE PLATFORM: IN BRIEF

Prieto and Bainter's second issue deals with implementing a citywide transportation system and a SafeRide program. Bainter said a citywide transportation system could alleviate Manhattan's congestion problem.

Bainter said it's a misconception that SafeRide is only a designated-driver taxi. He said that if students are studying at a friend's house and don't have a ride home, they can call SafeRide.

Bainter said he and Prieto are hoping some of the funding for both programs would come from the city, so a privilege fee or tuition increase wouldn't be needed.

If elected, the third issue Prieto and Bainter would focus on is a coalition initiative.

This initiative involves bringing together all social organizations and living organizations, on and off campus, to plan events.

A second part of this initiative is a course-work program to prepare students for diversity in the work force.

fessors' salaries, and students should be aware of why this is important to them and their futures.

"The best educators will not come to K-State because they won't get paid well," he said. "This affects the quality of education at the university, and in turn has an effect on the quality of your diploma."

A third issue on their platform is the allocation of privilege fees. Olson said a review of exactly who is getting how much would benefit students immensely.

VanNest and Olson also addressed the issues of campaign finance. The candidates said they want to make it easier for anyone to run, not just the students who have money to spend.

"I think it's intimidating to some candidates," Olson said, referring to how some candidates have more money to spend on T-shirts and advertising.

— Joey Eck

THE PLATFORM: IN BRIEF

"If it's a big issue, and we think it's probably not going to happen, we'll tell the students no," Klein said.

One of these issues is the library fee. Velasquez said that even though it's an important issue and he favors a general tuition increase, students complain too much about it. Klein said they would look into this issue, but that it isn't the top thing on their list right now.

"I don't think we can have a bake sale and pay for the library fund," Klein said.

When asked what they would change if they had the power to change anything they wanted to, faculty was their chief concern.

Velasquez said he wants faculty to get better salaries without putting a strain on the students. Klein said teachers should be made more aware of the positive feedback they get from students who fill out observation cards.

already existing government.

Wooten and Shea used three words to sum up their campaign — leadership, intelligence and fun. Each is reflected in how they want to make K-State better, they said, starting with overall campus beautification.

"We want to make the campus nicer," Shea said.

"Maybe have a pond where all that grass is by Anderson Hall, and geese could land, benches to sit around and construct fountains."

He said K-State has plenty of open land, and if K-State could make the land nicer, then maybe it could attract more students. Wooten stresses beautification of the campus as the main issue of their campaign.

"We would like to see a more visually pleasing campus, which will improve our overall image and boost student morale," Wooten said.

Macklin said they also thought of the students when choosing their campaign promises. They researched a lot of things before deciding what to promise to voters, Mann said.

Bosco said some issues never go away. He said his platform was teacher evaluations, parking, tuition increases and the library.

"Not to say we haven't come a long way since then; we have," he said. "But we still have challenges."

Bosco said a good way for candidates to find issues to include in a platform is to look at the Needs Assessment surveys. K-State conducts these for graduating seniors and alumni who have been out of college for one or four years.

"It's an extremely important tool when deciding on things we need to improve on," he said.

"It gives them ammunition as well as ideas to make K-State a better place to live and learn."

The best thing candidates can do when deciding on their issues is to relate to the average K-State student and pay attention to what's going on around them, Peterson said.

"They're involved in everyday campus life," he said.

"So, they probably have a pretty good idea on the issues that are important to them."

SO WHAT DO THESE PEOPLE DO, ANYWAY?

UNION GOVERNING BOARD

The Union Governing Board is made up of students and faculty who work closely with issues involving the K-State Student Union. UGB consists of 15 voting members. Twelve of the members are students, and the remaining three are faculty appointed by Faculty Senate.

Four of the student members are elected to their positions. The student body president, Student Alumni Board, Student Senate and other organizations appoint the other eight members.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said the purpose of UGB is to allow students and faculty to govern and make policies for the Union.

"It is designed as a vehicle to provide input for issues affecting the student Union," Pitts said. "It gives direct access for students to contribute to decisions concerning how we run the Union, the services we offer and the price structures for those services."

The Union staff also uses UGB as a sounding board for new ideas, he said. Other responsibilities of UGB are to review the annual budget for the Union and to serve on different committees.

The UGB has been involved in the renovation process of the Union as well, Pitts said.

FINE ARTS COUNCIL

The Fine Arts Council is made up of representatives from the College of Arts and Sciences who make decisions about the development of fine arts at K-State.

Students from the departments of Music, Art, and Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance, along with a representative from the dean's office, make up the council.

Arts and Sciences Assistant Dean Dennis Wilson said the Fine Arts Council distributes funds to fine arts programs at K-State.

"The council deals with funding artistic endeavors throughout the entire university," Wilson said. "In short, it is a governing and clearing body to determine where the money from SGA should be distributed."

The council receives proposals from groups and individuals for a variety of artistic programs or events.

"If someone wants to bring a concert or program to campus, they ask us," he said. "We get lots of proposals, so we have to weed out the good from the bad."

In the past, the council has sponsored visiting artists, guest conductors for the marching band and advertising for the annual jazz festival.

"It's our job to make sure the money we spend has a direct impact for K-State students," he said.

BOARD OF STUDENT PUBLICATIONS

The Board of Directors for Student Publications serves and oversees the constituent organizations of Student Publications Inc.

Five elected members, two faculty, the Director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, and one representative each from the Royal Purple, the Collegian, and the Student Publications Advertising Department make up the 11-member board.

Director of the School of Journalism Todd Simon said the board is responsible for interviewing candidates for the editor in chief and advertising manager positions, as well as for making financial decisions for Student Publications, Inc.

"Our most important job is to interview, vote, and hire the editors for the Royal Purple and the Collegian and the ad manager," Simon said. "Secondly, the board is a policy-making group for the financing of the members of Student Publications."

Simon said an important issue for the board this year is to pass by-law revision proposals.

"One of the big issues is that we've had these by-law revision proposals for four months, and we haven't gotten quorum at a meeting in order to pass them," he said. "I sure hope the new members plan on coming to the meetings."

STUDENT SENATE

Student Senate is the legislative body of the Student Governing Association.

It is made up of 60 representatives, with at least one representative from each of the colleges.

Two faculty members are also part of the Student Senate, and three students take part in the Faculty Senate.

Bill Muir, faculty member on Student Senate, said both Senates have powers given by the president of the university.

"This is the university's way of delegating power from the president to members of the faculty and student body," Muir said.

Even though the president has the power to overrule any of Senate's decisions, Muir said, his veto power has never been used.

Deciding how to spend student fees is probably the biggest job Senate has, Muir said.

There are six standing committees in Student Senate, and they run like a state legislature, he said.

"Basically, Student Senate is like a one-house legislature," Muir said. "They introduce bills, discuss legislation, and vote to pass the bills discussed."

COLLEGE COUNCILS

Each of the nine colleges at K-State has an elected body of students to serve as a college council.

According to the K-State Student Governing Association Constitution, the councils have some legislative and executive powers that have not been given to the student body president or the Student Senate.

President of the Engineering College Council Jason Lacey, senior in mechanical engineering, said the college councils are responsible for distributing funding to each college from the Student Senate.

The councils promote programs to benefit the students of their college, Lacey said.

"The student government allocates money to the college councils, who distribute it to the different organizations in the colleges," Lacey said.

The councils are also a direct link between the dean and the students, he said.

"They are a voice to represent the student body to the dean," Lacey said, "and they are often used by the dean as a sounding board for ideas as well."

Approval for any proposed amendments to the SGA Constitution must be given by six of the college councils before the amendment can be ratified.

STORIES BY LAUREN POSLADEK

NOW IT'S TIME TO DECIDE WHERE YOU STAND. IT'S TIME TO MAKE YOUR VOTE COUNT.

The candidates are grouped together by the offices for which they are running. First are the all-university boards, then student senate candidates broken down by college. To help you in your decision-making process, we asked each Senate candidate and each presidential ticket three issue questions, but it's up to you to decide where you stand.

THE ISSUES

ISSUE QUESTION NO. 1: Do you support a SafeRide program?

ISSUE QUESTION NO. 2: Do you support starting the fall semester earlier in order to have a fall break?

ISSUE QUESTION NO. 3: Do you support a city-wide transportation system?
